SYNOPSIS

Kezia Marsh, pretty, selfish and twenty, arrives home in Corinth from school and is met by her older brother, Hugh. He drives her to the Marsh home where her widowed mother, Fluvanna, a warm-hearted, self-sacrificing and understanding soul, welcomes her. Kezia's sister, Margery, plump and matronly with the care of three children, is at lunch with them. Hugh's wife, Dorrie, has pleaded a previous engagement. On the way back to his job at the steel plant founded by one of his forebears, Hugh passes Doc Hiller, a boyhood friend whom he no longer sees frequently because of Dorrie's antipathy. Fluvanna Marsh wakens the next morning from a dream about her late husband, Jim, whose unstable character she fears Kezia has inherited. Ellen Pendleton comes over. She is an artistically inclined girl who is a distant niece of Fluvanna's. She happily tells Fluvanna she has become engaged to Jerry Purdue. Ellen fears that her father and mother, Gavin and Lizzie, will not approve the match. Hugh and Dorrie go out to the Freeland Farms to dance with their friends, Cun and Joan Whitney. Whitney, who has been out of work, has a new position. Cun and Dorrie dance together and then disappear for a while. Dancing with Joan, Hugh is amazed to find her in tears. Apparently she has some secret worry over her husband, Cun. When Ellen and Jerry speak about their engagement to Ellen's parents, Lizzie is disagreeable until Jerry sympathizes with her imagined ailments. The matter is left pending. Unexpectedly Hugh has to visit a neighboring city on business. Returning home to ask Dorrie to accompany him he finds her telephoning. In confusion she quickly hangs up without saying good-by. She finally agrees to accompany him. They spend a delightful day and Hugh is happy. At a family party, Kezia encounters Jerry. Ellen is disturbed when Jerry is absorbed by Kezia. Kezia goes out of her way to charm Jerry. Fluvanna is concerned about Kezia, who is evasive about dates she has been having at night. She muses over the resemblance of Kezia to her late husband, recalling how temperamental, moody and improvident he had been. She recalls the tragic picture of his death—how after drinking and gambling to excess he is faced with financial ruin, how he tries to force her to mortgage her resources to pay his debts and threatens her with a gun.

"I borrowed the last on that."

"Will you telephone Kimball? He's waiting."

Her thoughts raced. If she could get away from him until he came to his senses! "I won't do anything until you lay that revolver down!"

He looked at her and then at the weapon sullenly. "I'll keep it until you go through with it."

Escape? . . . Escape? . . . Behind her was the attic door. Why hadn't she run downstairs—out into the yard? It was in her mind to gain the maid's room and lock the door. She whirled and ran up the stairs.

He caught up with her as she was closing the door, grasped her by the shoulders. "Give me time to think! . . . You are frightening me to death!" she moaned.

He placed the revolver at her breast. His face was savage. "You'll do as I tell you—now!"

She had caught the weapon in her hands, struggled with a strength she had never known she possessed. It had gone off with a terrible report.

The gun fell to the floor. Jim stared at her, his arms, his shoulders relaxed. She watched a red stain appear on his shirt—spread. He staggered. Chilling from head to foot, she put her arm around him, eased his fall.

All the beastliness was wiped out of Jim's face. He looked faintly surprised and puzzled. "I wasn't any good," he whispered with a half mocking smile. "Just as well I did it."

Downstairs she heard running footsteps.

He was still conscious when Dr. Carey came. "I did it, Doc—business losses," said Jim. He closed his eyes.

The universe did not cease its swaying and a remote and cloudy veil closed down upon her. The doctor kept her in bed; she couldn't have risen if she had tried. In her condition of shock she was beyond anything that required decision.

"I'm sending a nurse for a day or so," Dr. Carey had said.

In her sick fancy she seemed to see a pilgrimage of people, laughing, singing people, passing along a road, the women wreathing themselves with flowers picked by the roadside, bound together by the unity of happiness—their troubles only inconveniences — while she stood on an isolated crumbling precipice, alone.

Presently she knew comfort. But not of earth. The phrases of those on earth who longed to comfort, were kindly intentioned, but inadequate. Comfort came from interstellar spaces; through a million million light years it traveled to her, from higher, finer realms of ether. It radiated along the vast and delicate spider-web of thought in whose center dwells Divinity.

Warm and soft the comfort enfolded her. Understanding of every aching nerve and shattered illusion, understanding of loneliness, sorrow, and disgrace; understanding even of the overwrought soul who slays a fellow-being. Precious, pure vibrations, healing and upbuilding, like white fire that glowed, that warmed, but did not burn.

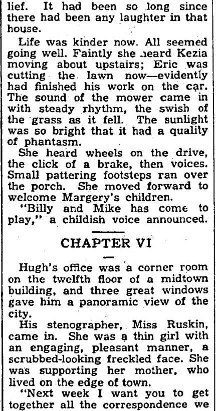
It came after weeks. She found herself able to rise from her bed and make her way downstairs. The rooms were half dusted, and had an air of neglect and disorder. The bird had not been fed regularly or his cage cleaned. The geraniums in the window boxes were dry and yellow. The sound of altercation came from the basement and a slap. Kezia's voice rose in a wail of abused misery.

Katie, the maid, came up dragging Kezia by the hand. "Never was such a mean little brat! Into everything!" She stopped, stared to see Fluvanna on the first floor.

Kezia, seven, but her baby, a mean little brat? Only a mischievous, lovable darling! She took a swift step forward and Kezia ran sobbing to her. She heard the story of Kezia's blowing out a fuse while Katie was ironing her dress for a picnic; she sent Katie back to her work. She sat in a big chair comforting Kezia, knowing the delicious sweetness of the child's fragile arms around her neck.

Hugh came in presently, his lean boyish face too grave for his years, leggy and awkward in his first long trousers. She saw the look of incredulous joy in his eyes. Hugh . . . Hugh. Always one child who is closer to the heart. Hugh was sensitive, had a grave inarticulate idealism—he was shouldering a burden too great for sixteen.

He kissed her fondly. Margery was bicycling on the speedway. She shouldn't, should she, Mother? It was black with cars going forty miles an hour, and if her bike wobbled . . . But she wouldn't come for him. He would go back and tell her Mother wanted her. That would bring her. He departed. In a few minutes Margery, usually so dainty, came in shrill and blowsy, her dress on backward and two buttons missing.



"You'll Do as I Tell You—Now!"

Fluvanna began to laugh. They stared at her round-eyed. Then they all joined in with sheer relief. It had been so long since there had been any laughter in that house.

Life was kinder now. All seemed going well. Faintly she heard Kezia moving about upstairs; Eric was cutting the lawn now—evidently had finished his work on the car. The sound of the mower came in with steady rhythm, the swish of the grass as it fell. The sunlight was so bright that it had a quality of phantasm.

She heard wheels on the drive, the click of a brake, then voices. Small pattering footsteps ran over the porch. She moved forward to welcome Margery's children.

"Billy and Mike has come to play," a childish voice announced.

CHAPTER VI

Hugh's office was a corner room on the twelfth floor of a midtown building, and three great windows gave him a panoramic view of the city.

His stenographer, Miss Ruskin, came in. She was a thin girl with an engaging, pleasant manner, a scrubbed-looking freckled face. She was supporting her mother, who lived on the edge of town.

"Next week I want you to get together all the correspondence we have with the Dayton people on that contract. Have it ready by Monday noon. They are talking of a lawsuit and I want to go over it."

Her face looked a little bricky with the flush which spread over it. She bent over her pad: "I'll have Miss Jones do it—or I'll work late tonight. Next week—have you forgotten?—I'm to take my vacation."

"I had forgotten. You asked for the first two weeks in September, didn't you? And what are you doing during your vacation?"

Her face lighted. "Four of us—girls—are taking a cabin on Rocky Creek. We'll cook our own meals, go swimming, fishing, just be generally lazy."

"And forget all about the steel business?"

She smiled. "Yes."

"It sounds like a nice vacation."

MINNESOTA NEWS

Marshall—Burglars entered the Olson and Lowe clothing store here and stole 186 suits of men's clothing valued at approxiamtely $5,000. The thieves gained entrance by lowering one of their group on a rope through a skylight.

Biwabik—Another deer hunting fatality was recorded with the death of Carl Lester Wantonen, 14, who was killed while playing in a field near here by a stray bullet. No trace of the origin of the bullet could be found, but authorities believed it was fired from the rifle of a deer hunter.

Duluth—Excavation and construction of the basement of the new state hospital for the insane at Moose Lake was started, with remaining major contracts to be let within the next month, L. G. Foley, chairman of the state board of control, said. The basement will be constructed at a cost of about $50,000.

Ironton—A conference here between R. I. Wahl, general manager of the Inland Steel Company at the Armour No. 1 mine and the employees' representatives resulted in a minimum rate of pay of 53 cents an hour with specific increases in all rates above that level based upon a revaluation of the particular classification.

Minneapolis — Minnesota's annual Christmas tree harvest is already well under way, Grover Conzet, state forester, reported. Thousands of Yule trees, 90 per cent of which are black spruce, are being felled and transported to warehouses. It is estimated 1,750,000 trees will be cut in Minnesota this year and that 600,000 will be used in the state.

Spring Valley—Although voting as a citizen for nearly 35 years, a former Spring Valley man was ruled by the state attorney-general never to have been legally naturalized. A. N. Farmer, once school superintendent at St. Cloud and prominent in education at several Minnesota cities, unknowingly had voted and acted as a citizen—though he never was one.

Minneapolis—Joan Dahl, five-year-old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James Dahl, 3240 Forty-fourth avenue S., received the grand national prize of $250 for the best picture of a child taken in any one of 200 photo studios in department stores throughout the United States. Joan's picture was selected from nearly a quarter of a million submitted in the contest sponsored by Parents magazine.

St. Paul—Two-year-old Eugenia Loeber is the northwest's first baby wired for sound. Her father, Carl Loeber, inspector for the federal communications division, rigged up a microphone over Eugenia's crib and attached it to the radio loudspeaker downstairs. Now Mrs. Loeber can even hear Eugenia's breathing, and if she plays in her crib instead of going to sleep, the radio tells Mrs. Loeber.

South St. Paul—Richer by some $55,000 as the result of the auction of their animals and poultry at the Minnesota Junior Livestock show, 1,075 4-H club boys and girls were back at their homes in all parts of the state laying plans for next year's competition. The $55,000 which S. E. Sheehy, sales chairman, estimated was paid for the animals and poultry is a new high record, topping last year's total by some $3,000.

Minneapolis—Minneapolis has played to the tune of $2,500,000 in the last six weeks. The sum was poured into cash registers throughout the city in the greatest spree of spending for amusement, recreation and relaxation since the depression. Better times and Minnesota's Golden Gophers combined to loose the pursestrings of Minneapolis residents and visitors. Not even the avid interest in state and national election campaigns contrived to put a halt to the spending.

Minneapolis—The University of Minnesota board of regents was advised by Attorney General Harry H. Peterson that it alone has authority to administer the institution's financial affairs and details of management. Peterson's opinion, regarded as sweeping aside even questions concerning legislative authority in university affairs, developed from a demand by the state division of veterans relief that the university waive tuition for needy children of World war soldiers.

International Falls—Frank W. Brunskill, 56, former Minneapolis chief of police, who resigned last March from the department after 25 years of service, died of a heart attack while on a deer hunting trip near here. The former chief, who quit the department after a colorful career to become associated with the Yoerg Brewing company of St. Paul, awoke about 1:30 a. m. and complained to Dr. L. R. Koller and Dr. Henry Lysne, Minneapolis physicians and members of the hunting party, that he felt ill. Both doctors arose and attempted to relieve Brunskill but he died a short time later.

St. Paul—Eight hundred members of Veterans of Foreign Wars posts and auxiliaries throughout the state attended the fifth annual VFW school of instruction and pow wow in the Hotel Lowry. Speakers were Alexander Miller of Des Moines, judge advocate general; Governor-elect Elmer A. Benson; Senator-elect Ernest Lundeen; Victor A. Christgau, state WPA administrator; Governor Hjalmar Petersen, Mayor Mark Gehan of St. Paul and C. D. Hibbard, regional director of the United States veterans' bureau

On to Success—

With It Comes Boldness in New Ideas; Our Sphere of Friends and Activities Expands

A POOR salesman may be a genius at gardening; an indifferent stenographer sometimes never suspects her own gift for cookery, for dress design, for ability to pick up foreign languages. By thinking candidly about yourself, by being as friendly to yourself as you would be to another, you can often draw up a picture of your tastes, abilities, desires and hopes which will astonish you.

Take an inventory of yourself, paying special attention to the things you like but which you have little of in your daily life. Then start putting them into it.

From Interest to a Specialty

Often we have to begin slowly—reading, or finding courses of instruction within our means, or working out a program for ourselves in solitude; but every day something can be done toward the new way of living. It can grow from an interest into a hobby, from a hobby into a side line, from a side line into a specialty. Then comes the day when the unsatisfactory work can be given up (to someone who will find it as satisfying and as absorbing as we find our own new field) and success is at last really and noticeably on its way to us—or we are on our way to it.

Vitalizes Character

Then living begins to be fun. We meet people with the same tastes, not just the chance acquaintances who come our way in an uncongenial profession. Having succeeded once, we begin to show a little daring; we try new ideas more boldly, and our world of friends and activities expands even more. Chances we couldn't even imagine until we got inside our real work turn up on every hand. Best of all, even a small success has a vitalizing effect on character.

That is the most interesting discovery that success brings in its train: those who are living successfull, make the best friends. They are free from malice and spitefulness. They are not petty. They are full of good talk and humor.—Dorothea Brande in Cosmopolitan.

A $1 Dinner for 4

HOW is your arithmetic? If you add these figures you will find the sum total is exactly one dollar. And if you know your dietetics as well as your mathematics, you will find that the sum total of these foods is a perfectly balanced meal.

It follows then, if you are wise that you will serve this sort of meal at least one day a week, and you will be healthy and wealthy as well. The recipes are tested.

Simple to Make

Celery, Cabbage and Tomatoes: Have one cup cabbage cut in fairly large pieces and one cup celery cut in inch lengths. Cook separately until almost tender. Drain, add the contents of one 10-ounce can of tomatoes, salt and pepper to taste, and one small sliced onion. Simmer until tender.

Blackberry Trifle: Spread three-quarters cup of cornflakes in the bottom of a well buttered baking dish and cover with the contents of an 8-ounce can of blackberries from which the juice has been strained. Sprinkle one-fourth cup of sugar over, dot with one tablespoon butter, and cover with three-fourths cup of cornflakes. Pour in the blackberry syrup drained from the fruit, and bake in a moderate oven—375 degrees—for thirty minutes. Serve warm with light cream.*

Better Breakfasts

IF your idea is to get thin, eat your breakfast of toast without butter and coffee without cream—and like it. But if your idea is to eat a real good breakfast that is pleasingly different, one that bears no relation to the conventional fruit juice, dry cereal, bacon or eggs, then you'll be enthusiastic about this one.

It will add a joy to your morning that makes you whistle on your way to work, or warble as you wash dishes—if, you're like that. And it can most all be prepared while the coffee pot sings.

Figs with Cream
Wheatena
Deviled Cream Toast
Strawberry Preserves Coffee

Deviled Cream Toast: Make a cream sauce of three tablespoons butter, three tablespoons flour and two cups of milk (or diluted evaporated milk.) Add the contents of one 2¾-ounce can of deviled ham and stir smooth. Season to taste with salt and pepper and serve on toast. This serves six persons.

Note: The figs may be canned and should be left in the refrigerator overnight.

Vacuum Packed Coffee

Be sure to buy one of the brands of vacuum packed coffee because that is the only way in which you can be sure to have it fresh. Stale coffee will spoil any breakfast, but the oxygen which makes them stale is excluded from all vacuum packed coffees.*

Mince-Meat Pies

"Sit ye, Knights, with victuals nigh
A bumper of ale, and real Mynce Pie!"

AND right well does this knave deserve a feather in his cap if his ample tray is laden with this Christmas fare. From the early Anglo-Saxon feasts down to present-day dinner parties, mince pie has been the choice of Yule-tide desserts.

When you gather around the family board this Christmas, have some variations of this time-honored dish. You will find it even more savory for the addition of choice pears for example, and far, far more digestible than was the early version. Those were the days of curves—not lines. Here are modern recipes with the old-time flavor:

Pear and Mince Pie: Line pie tin with pastry and cover the bottom with four canned pear halves cut in four slices lengthwise. Sprinkle with two tablespoons brown sugar. Add three tablespoons pear syrup to the contents of one 1-pound can of mince-meat. Heat and pour over the pears in crust. Cover with strips of crust to form a lattice top and bake in a 425 degree oven for thirty minutes. This makes one pie.

And Cookies, Too

Mince-Meat Hermits: Cream one-third cup butter and one-half cup brown sugar. Add one well-beaten egg. Add one cup canned mince-meat and one cup flour which has been sifted with two teaspoons baking powder. Drop by spoonfuls onto a greased cooky sheet. Bake in a hot oven—400 degrees—for eight to ten minutes. This makes thirty cookies.*

He was given his preliminaay hearing on Sept. 29 and bound over for district court for trial. Investigators from the old age assistance office headed by Paul Steen, local administrator, and A. A. ## BANK CHARTERING POLICY REVIEWED

State Official Declares Correct Principles in Licensing Banks Are Essential for Sound Banking Conditions

PHILADELPHIA. — Sound public policy in chartering banks was discussed by Carl K. Withers, Commissioner of Banking and Insurance of the State of New Jersey, before the Eastern Conference on Banking Service, held here recently under the auspices of the American Bankers Association. He declared that "few questions bearing on the future stability and security of our banking systems loom as more important than that of a sound policy to be pursued in the chartering of banks."

Alluding to competitive policies of both state and national banking authorities to charter the most banks in the past, he said that "this country was over-banked, and that aside from any other consideration, economic or otherwise, this condition was brought about largely through an unwise, unsafe and unthinking charter policy, alternating between the state and national systems, which has marked and hampered banking progress in this country since its very inception."

Political Influence

He decried political considerations in connection with the chartering of banks, saying: "Political influence has no more place in banking than it has in the deliberations of our highest tribunal—The Supreme Court of the United States. Until this is recognized and brought into being within both our state and national systems, we may never feel safe against the shifting sands of political expedience."

As to the "element of sometimes ridiculous competition heretofore existing between the state and national systems," he said that much may be said in favor of the progress made in recent years. In many states there exists a practical working agreement between local supervising authorities and the federal authorities.

Safetygrams

BY FRED W. BRAUN The Safety Man

Winter weather will soon be with us. With it comes fog, ice, sleet, snow, and slippery roads. What are you doing to prepare for it?

Every driver should see that his car is properly conditioned for winter driving. Windshield wipers should be reconditioned. The elimination of fog, sleet, ice and snow from the windshield is very important, and many very good devices are on the market for this purpose. Equip your car with a device that will give you clear good vision during such weather.

Control your speed on slippery roads. Go slow — go easy — be careful. THINK.

A pump will be placed over the well and a reservoir constructed nearby.

Hastings—An example of local pride shown by WPA workers in their project is to be found here, where a crew has volunteered to complete, on its own time and without pay, a series of concrete tennis courts. The original application covering the project was insufficient to complete the work and a supplemental application became necessary. Rather than risk leaving an uncompleted project, the workers continued on the project, completing it when they were not regularly employed on other units of the new athletic field at Hastings.

Temptation

TO RESIST temptation once is not a sufficient proof of honesty. If a servant, indeed, were to resist the continued temptation of silver lying in a window when he is sure his master does not know how much there is of it, he would give strong proof of honesty. But this is a proof to which There is a degree of temptation there is a degree of temptation which will overcome any virtue. Now, in so far as you approach temptation to a man, you do him an injury; and, if he is overcome, you share his guilt.—Dr. Johnson.

SYNOPSIS

Kezia Marsh, pretty, selfish and twenty, arrives home in Corinth from school and is met by her older brother, Hugh. He drives her to the Marsh home where her widowed mother, Fluvanna, a warm-hearted, self-sacrificing and understanding soul, welcomes her. Kezia's sister, Margery, plump and matronly with the care of three children, is at lunch with them. Hugh's wife, Dorrie, has pleaded a previous engagement. On the way back to his job at the steel plant founded by one of his forebears, Hugh passes Doc Hiller, a boyhood friend whom he no longer sees frequently because of Dorrie's antipathy. Fluvanna Marsh wakens the next morning from a dream about her late husband, Jim, whose unstable character she fears Kezia has inherited. Ellen Pendleton comes over. She is an artistically inclined girl who is a distant niece of Fluvanna's. She happily tells Fluvanna she has become engaged to Jerry Purdue. Ellen fears that her father and mother, Gavin and Lizzie, will not approve the match. Hugh and Dorrie go out to the Freeland Farms to dance with their friends, Cun and Joan Whitney. Whitney, who has been out of work, has a new position. Cun and Dorrie dance together and then disappear for a while. Dancing with Joan, Hugh is amazed to find her in tears. Apparently she has some secret worry over her husband, Cun. When Ellen and Jerry speak about their engagement to Ellen's parents, Lizzie is disagreeable until Jerry sympathizes with her imagined ailments. The matter is left pending. Unexpectedly Hugh has to visit a neighboring city on business. Returning home to ask Dorrie to accompany him he finds her telephoning. In confusion she quickly hangs up without saying good-by. She finally agrees to accompany him. They spend a delightful day and Hugh is happy. At a family party, Kezia encounters Jerry. Ellen is disturbed when Jerry is absorbed by Kezia. Kezia goes out of her way to charm Jerry. Fluvanna is concerned about Kezia, who is evasive about dates she has been having at night. She muses over the resemblance of Kezia to her late husband, recalling how temperamental, moody and improvident he had been. She recalls the tragic picture of his death—how after drinking and gambling to excess he is faced with financial ruin, how he tries to force her to mortgage her resources to pay his debts and threatens her with a gun, how in a struggle for its possession he is fatally wounded.

"I've been counting the days and it seems as though I could scarcely wait. The cabin has a big fireplace where we can burn logs on cool nights; it's near enough to town — ten miles — so that our friends can drive out to see us. We'll have suppers for them—play cards—sing—dance to the radio."

"Friends," mused Hugh. "Any special ones?"

"Special?" The reticence of her English blood made her look suddenly shy. "You mean men? Well, there's always someone who—takes an interest."

"And he'll come out?"

"Yes."

"We can't get along very well unless someone takes an interest, can we? If it's too special I'll lose my very good stenographer, however. That would be a calamity—unless—it was essential to your happiness."

"He hasn't enough money," said Miss Ruskin in a low tone She moved her pad on her knee and lifted her pencil for his dictation.

Hugh turned in his swivel chair and picked up a sheaf of letters. "Just one or two of these should go out today. The others can wait. I know you want to get away early."

"Mr. Marsh," said Miss Ruskin speaking with an effort, "you say we can't get along without someone who takes an interest. I say we can't get along without a vacation. It helps us to look at things differently; we are stronger to take care of our troubles when we come back. You haven't had a vacation. You—you look as if you needed one."

Hugh shook his head. "Just lack of exercise. I'm all right. Too many problems this summer to get away. Starting tonight, I'm walking home—two miles. I'm going to walk night and morning—exercise is all I need."

After she left the room, he remembered that Doc Hiller, whom he had run into at lunch had said the same thing. Doc had asked him what he was doing to himself—burning the candle at both ends? He had gazed at him critically. "You'd better drop in some noon, let me look you over. That old plant will be there after you're dead and gone, my boy. You are killing yourself with overwork."

He took his hat to leave the office. Five o'clock—Saturday afternoon. He would walk home, although he didn't feel like it.

It would be good to have a vacation, play and swim as Miss Ruskin intended doing, but that was out of the question. He had urged Dorrie to go away, visit her sister Beryl, or her mother who had married a dentist in Rochester, go to the seashore. But she had shaken her head. She was contented here. It was no fun at the seashore if he couldn't go along.

Late Saturday afternoon traffic tied up the crossings in a tangle of cars and hurrying pedestrians. The September heat was as oppresive as that of July, and it seemed a long way to his home. When he entered his front door he was grateful for the coolness of the house. He whistled a signal and received an answer from upstairs. He looked at the paper for a few minutes before going up.

Dorrie was dressing when he entered their room, was pinning the shoulder of her yellow dress. She pointed to her cheek and he kissed her there. "My make-up," she said smiling. "Hasn't it been ghastly hot? I envied you high up in your cool office."

"It was hot there, too. You're looking unusually devastating. What's the answer? Are we going out?"

"We're going over to Joan's—have you forgotten?" She did not say it with a hint of impatience as she usually did when he forgot; her tone was indulgent. "Had to work late again Saturday afternoon, poor Hugh? Why don't you lie down and nap for a half-hour before your bath? I'll call you in time."

"Bridge?"

"Yes; but one of Joan's good chicken and spaghetti dinners first. You'll like that." She folded the spread of one of the beds with meticulous care, pulled down the sheet invitingly.

He could have slept for hours but he was awakened in a few minutes by Dorrie standing over him saying: "Time to dress, Hugh."

Drowsily he opened his eyes. The late sunlight was glimmering yellow on the ivy which arabesqued the screens. He had to dress and go out to that confounded dinner—play cards.

"Would you like me to lay out your shirt and tie? Put the buttons in your collar?" Dorrie spoke gently. As if she had been in error about something and was tacitly apologizing.

He rose, rubbing his eyes. No apology was needed of course. It was understood between them that Saturday night they should entertain or go somewhere. Perhaps she felt the bridge game was an ordeal. "I'll wear white flannels and a blue coat."

"Then you'll want a white shirt and a blue tie." Dorrie pulled open his drawer.

He felt revived by her sympathy, in better spirits, more alert. Lately she seemed to be thinking thoughts apart from him, listening to him and not hearing what he said. Sweet sometimes—sharply critical others.

He took his shower and was dressing when Dorrie said: "Anything happen today down town?"

"Not much. Just the usual." Then his face brightened. "Yes, it did. I had lunch with Doc Hiller, met him in the grill of the Renshaw House. It was great to see him. I hadn't talked to him for a year. You know Doc and I were just like that," he crossed his fingers, "when we were boys."

"Go on," said Dorrie. "That's not all."

"Not all? Just about. He had some foolishness that I'm not looking well, and wants to see me Monday at his office." He looked at her from the tail of his eye. Should he have said that? Would she be alarmed?

But Dorrie was observing him with faint derision. "Go on with the rest of it."

"What do you mean?"

Hugh, you have no finesse—absolutely none! You were just about to say, "Let's have the Hillers over some night soon. We've never returned the dinner they gave for us,'—now weren't you?"

"I don't think I was," replied Hugh with irritation. "It wouldn't have been any use . . . and they probably wouldn't come if we did ask them. They'd tell us to go hang—they have some pride."

"You're mad," teased Dorrie. "Do get mad often! I like you when you storm like that and get red in the face!"

"Oh—rot!" He pulled his tie undone and retied it, muttering, "We could have been courteous to them at least!"

In silence he finished dressing and in silence they got into the car.

Half-way to the Whitneys, she laid her hand on his knee. "Be nice," she coaxed.

His left brow went up whimsically. "You be nice."

"I will," she promised, and began to chat gayly about the clever way an agent for a coffee concern had wormed his way into the house that morning. "He was just like a phonograph!"

"Treat them kindly, even if you don't buy," he advised Dorrie. "It's the hardest kind of work, and they make scarcely anything."

"I ordered a couple of pounds of his coffee—sent him on his way rejoicing."

Cun greeted them at the door, with a hearty welcome. "The ice is almost melted! I made the mistake of shaking them up too early! . . . Come on, Joan."

Joan came hurrying in from the kitchen; the open door wafted in an odor of appetizing food. "Are the Marshes dry—or wet?"

"'Evening, Joan! Very dry with this blistering heat."

"Well, soak this up," said Cun, refilling Hugh's half-emptied glass. "Dorrie, say when."

Joan's table, with its lace cloth, tall candles and centerpiece of red lavender wild asters, was attractive. She kept no maid, and served everything herself with the aid of a tea wagon. The spaghetti was cooked in Italian style with a highly seasoned pepper and tomato sauce; the spring chickens were browned to a delicate crispness; the endive salad had a dressing made of yolks of eggs and rose-petal vinegar; the dessert was strawberry shortcake.

Keeping Christmas Faith—

Spirit of Happiness Much Needed in the Days Prior to the Festival

◆

WHATEVER you do in the way of preparations for Christmas, be sure to preserve the happy Christmas spirit in the home. Nothing is more at war with the atmosphere of Merry Christmas than cross words, wrangles, disputes, and anything that mars good nature in yourselves or those in the home. The pressure of work, the haste that makes waste, the beauty of home life, the conflict of problems, each of which seems imperative to solve on the instant, are not conducive to an atmosphere of concord. It takes a person of remarkable poise not to be influenced by the speeding up of work and activities prior to the festival.

Personal Influence

Because this is true, every one of us should be on guard over ourselves. We have an influence. No one can escape this. It may do us good to realize that we are not totally insignificant. Many persons feel this is their fate when they are very modest or shy, and crave to be among the group of those who attract attention. By the negative method of induction we can discover our influence is not negligible. It exists, perhaps to our surprise, and certainly to our dismay, when we see the effects of our disagreeable conduct.

Beneficent Effects

It is a comfort to realize that in reverse order, the better side of our nature is equally impressive. Our good nature, our cheery attitude, our soothing words, and our hearty happiness leave their beneficent effect upon those who know us—our family, our friends, and even those who are but acquaintances.

It is this fine attitude that is brought out in the real Christmas spirit. It is one that is needed in the rush before Christmas as much as on the day itself. Our patience and such sweetness of temperament as we are by nature endowed, or by cultivation possessed of, is called into action to help keep atmosphere serene when there is a trend toward querulousness in children, or adults. Little folk are quick to sense strain and tenseness, and they react to it by nervousness and contrariness, and an atmosphere of love and beauty is harshly disturbed.

Keeping Faith

On the adults falls the responsibility of keeping faith with Christmas by showing the Christmas spirit in these days of expectations of holiday happiness, and preparation for the great festival.

Ideal Companionship

TRUE love must be built upon absolutely true friendship; there can be no other foundation for it. . . The man and the woman must have the all-powerful sense of ideal companionship between them. They must be able to say with truth to themselves that the world will always be richer to them together than apart. There may be many other elements in love but there can be no love at all without this element. — Harold Frederic.

Mistake-O-Graph

What with all the excitement of the Christmas season our artist has found it rather hard to keep away from the toy department. Of course, he goes there purely in the interest of the kiddies, and not for his own amusement, he claims. The excitement seems to have gone to his head however, as we notice several bad mistakes. For example, the word "hosiery" is misspelled. Can you find 15 other mistakes? The answers are given above.

PLUM PUDDING with a Personality

LITTLE JACK HORNER would have to stick his thumb a long way into a plum pudding in order to pull out a plum. And even then he'd probably find he'd pulled a "boner." For plum puddings, as far back as you can trace their history, are notorious for being without plums. And that's no doubt the reason Jack ordered Christmas pie.

But there are many other good things resident in plum puddings—and since we don't stick our thumbs in them, we are not apt to miss plums. Some of the most excellent plum puddings are those which come in attractively decorated tins. These puddings are the acme of the plum pudding maker's art. They have that savory, mellow flavor of puddings which graced the festive boards of Early England. Modern chefs, however, have made of these puddings something far more easily digested. And when you consider the cost and the labor of making a plum pudding, you will no doubt find that plum puddings in tins fit nicely into your budget scheme.

Easy As Pie!

Perhaps, however, you like to make your own plum pudding at home. It takes time, but there is satisfaction in preparing your own holiday goodies, and today, when you can buy nuts, dates and other ingredients all ready to use in cans, it is quite a different matter from making plum puddings years ago. The following tested recipes are very good.

Clip These

Fairy Plum Pudding: Soak one and one-half tablespoons gelatin in three-fourths cup cold water. Melt two squares of sweet chocolate in a double boiler, add one-sixth cup of sugar and stir to a paste. Add one-sixth cup more of sugar and the gelatin; stir until dissolved. Then add one and one-half cups of scalded evaporated milk and three tablespoons syrup from stuffed oranges, and let the mixture stand until it begins to set. Then fold in the stiffly-beaten whites of three eggs, one cup of chopped stuffed orange and three-eighths cup of canned walnuts which have been chopped. Turn into small molds wet with cold water and set away to chill. Turn out and garnish with whipped cream and red and green cherries. This serves eight persons.

Christmas Plum Pudding: Combine one-half cup grated raw sweet potato, one-half cup grated raw carrot, one-half cup suet, one-fourth cup molasses and one-fourth cup sugar. Add one-half cup chopped canned walnuts, one-fourth cup thinly-sliced citron, one-fourth cup currants and one-fourth cup chopped candied orange peel. Mix well, and add two tablespoons white grape juice and two well-beaten eggs. Sift the following dry ingredients together and add: three-fourths cup flour, one-half teaspoon salt, one-fourth teaspoon soda, one-half teaspoon baking powder, one-half teaspoon cinnamon, one-half teaspoon nutmeg and one-fourth teaspoon cloves. Pour into a greased pudding mold, cover and steam for three hours. Serve with the following French pudding sauce. This serves eight persons.

French Pudding Sauce: Cream together one-half cup butter and one cup confectioner's sugar. Add one stiffly-beaten egg white and one-half cup cream, beaten. Add three tablespoons grenadine and a few grains of salt. Serve at once over the hot pudding.*

The Cherry Month

DOES anyone exist who doesn't like the tart sweetness, the unique taste of cherries, those most individual of fruits? We eat cherries this month in memory of George Washington, but the memories that remain to us from eating them simply make us want to eat more. You can eat delicious cherries out of cans all through the year, or, if you prefer, you can put them up as preserves. Try the following recipes for this purpose.

Choice Cherry Recipes

Cherry Preserves: Boil rapidly the contents of a No. 10 can of red pitted cherries and two cups of sugar, until the mixture drops thickly from a spoon, or to 218 degrees. Stir with wooden spoon to prevent burning. Pour into hot glasses or jars, and seal. This makes about three quarts.

Red Raspberry and Cherry Preserves: Slightly crush the red pitted cherries from a No. 10 can, and add the contents of a No. 10 can of raspberries. Boil the fruit and three and a half cups of sugar rapidly until it drops thickly from a spoon, or to 218 degrees. Stir with a wooden spoon to prevent burning. Pour into hot glasses or jars, and seal. This makes about six quarts.

Cherry and Pineapple Preserves: These require a No. 10 can of red pitted cherries, a No. 3 can of crushed pineapple and two cups of sugar, and are made in exactly the same manner as the recipe above. This recipe makes six quarts.*

KRAUT

BEER
SAUERKRAUT

Recovers Its Partner

THE "belle of the ball," of another decade, has become "ace girl" at the parties of today. Certain party foods, like certain party girls have always been much sought after—for example, sauerkraut. Even during prohibition sauerkraut was a popular food to serve at certain types of jolly-good-fellow parties, and for home meals. But it is twice as popular now, since its old partner—beer—is back.

Beer has not only staged a great come back, but it has moved right into the home in cans. Be sure, when you serve this conveniently packed beer, to include plenty of sauerkraut dishes in the menu.

Here Are Sour "Ace" Recipes

Sauerkraut Salad: Chill one 15-ounce can of sauerkraut, drain thoroughly and mix with two-thirds cup of crisp shredded raw carrot. Moisten with one-third cup of mayonnaise. This serves six persons.

Jellied Sauerkraut Salad: Dissolve six packages of lemon gelatin in three quarts of boiling water and add one and one-half teaspoons salt. Cool. Add the contents of two No. 2 cans of sauerkraut, one and one-half cups of diced cucumber, one and one-half cups of diced apple and one cup of diced celery. Pour into fifty individual molds, or in a large flat pan and chill. If a large pan is used, serve cut in squares. Serve on crisp lettuce with mayonnaise garnish. This serves fifty persons.*

Boy Scout Demonstration Held

The Boy Scout Troop No. 112 of Holt gave a public demonstration on Tuesday evening. A large crowd attended.

Enough cannot be said in these columns to do justice to the program the boys gave.

Much credit is due the boys who put on the demonstration so efficiently, but more is due the Scoutmaster, Hartley Peterson, and Assistant Scoutmasters, Stilaf Anderson and Joe Moline, who have spent much time and patience with the boys.

Mr. Mayer-Oakes, district commissioner, in his speech said in his 28 years of Scout work he had not seen a better demonstration put on. It went on without a fumble or pause, with everything ready beforehand.

The program opened with a pyramid formation of the troop. The boys were then called to attention with the bugle call, and the Scout Oath and Salute to the Flag given.

Then complicated signalling demonstrations were given, one with flags and one with flashlights.

A knot tying relay race was then held.

If any part of the demonstration should be outstanding it was the first aid work the boys have learned. They showed several first aid measures in case of automobile accident and how to move the patient.

After the speech by Mr. Mayer-Oakes of Thief River Falls the boys gave a very touching and inspiring Candlelight Ceremony.

Members of the troop are:

Tenderfoot Scouts

"Two Tickets to Terror"

By FLOYD GIBBONS

Famous Headline Hunter

IT WAS just a couple of tickets that started the whole thing. Those tickets played the major role in the yarn we're going to hear today. And along with them went ten minutes of Grade A terror and, on top of that, a surprise that will knock you for a row of box offices.

It's Louise Addelson of New York City who is telling the story, but the adventure happened to her aunt.

It was the tickets that started it all, but it was a letter that dragged Auntie into the affair. Auntie had a daughter, Helen, who had recently married. She was living in a furnished apartment in Montreal, and one day she wrote that her husband was away on business, and she was lonesome, and wouldn't Auntie like to come and pay her a visit?

Auntie went. She got there in October—and a few days afterward, on the 23d of the month, the tickets showed up.

Tickets for Helen and Her Mother.

It happened this way. The apartment directly over Helen's was occupied by a young couple, the Chesters, with whom she and her husband had recently struck up an acquaintance. On the afternoon of the twenty-third, Mrs. Chester came downstairs to call. She said her husband had purchased some theater tickets, and now a telegram had called him away to the sick bed of his mother in another town. They couldn't go to the show, so they wanted to give the tickets to Helen and her mother. Mrs. Chester insisted that they take them, and wouldn't hear of letting them pay for them.

Auntie didn't really want to go to the theater. Some time before she had lost her husband, and shortly after that her son had died. She hadn't been to a show or any other place of amusement since, and didn't really have any desire to go. She only agreed to go this time for her daughter's sake, and she was immensely relieved when, while they were dressing that evening, her son-in-law returned unexpectedly from his business trip and took her place.

The young couple went out. Auntie is an old-fashioned mother, and no sooner were they out of the house than she set the ironing board up in the kitchen and began ironing the underwear and linen that had been washed that day. She was still busily at work when she heard a strange, buzzing sound at the front door.

She Still Had the Hot Iron

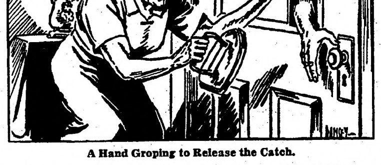
With the iron still in her hand, she walked to the front of the apartment. There was a large hole in the door, and someone, even then, was boring another. For an instant she was puzzled. Then, as she realized what was happening she almost collapsed with fright. Someone was trying to break into the house!



A Hand Groping to Release the Catch.

For whole minutes she stood, rooted to the spot, incapable of moving even so much as a muscle. She watched while a tiny saw blade was inserted through one of the holes—watched it while a larger opening was cut in the door. It was only when the opening was completed and a hand reached through and began groping to release the catch on the inside that she could move at all. Then, suddenly she became aware of the heat of the iron in her hand.

Almost instinctively she lifted the iron. Without seeming to form any plan in her mind, she acted. Tiptoeing across the hall to the door she pressed the iron down hard on the reaching, fumbling hand!

There was a yell outside that was loud enough to be heard half a block away. The hall was filled with the odor of burned flesh. The hand was jerked out of the opening and she could hear the footsteps of its owner scurrying away.

She heaved a sigh of relief, but still she was badly frightened. What if the man came back? She wouldn't stay alone in that apartment for another minute.

So She Took Refuge With the Chesters.

The only people she knew in the house were the Chesters upstairs. Mr. Chester would be out of town traveling to the bedside of his ailing mother. She didn't know whether Mrs. Chester had gone with him or not. If she hadn't—if she was home—maybe she would come down and stay with Auntie until her daughter and son-in-law returned.

She ran out the rear entrance, scampered up the stairs and knocked on the Chesters' back door. Then, without waiting for an answer, she tried the door. The knob turned. The door swung open. And Auntie burst in on a tableau that gave her the second shock of the evening and the big surprise of her whole life.

Seated in a chair in the kitchen was the supposedly absent Mr. Chester. And standing over him was Mrs. Chester, applying salve to a bad burn on his outstretched right hand!

The Scheme Was Exposed

Mr. Chester scrambled to his feet. Mrs. Chester ran to the door and banged it in Auntie's face. For a moment she was too dazed to think. Then the whole explanation came to her. The Chesters had planned to get her and Helen out of the house so they would be free to rob Helen of her wedding gifts and a few valuable jewels she owned. The theater tickets were just a trick to get them out for the evening and leave the apartment empty. And only the unexpected return of Helen's husband had interferred with the scheme.

As soon as she could get her wits together, Auntie called the police, but Auntie never saw the Chesters again. They, too, lived in a furnished apartment. And by the time the police arrived they had packed up their few personal belongings and fled.

The Term "Arab"

The term "Arab", as generally used, signifies any people professing Islam, however dark-skinned they may be, states a writer in the Indianapolis News. Abraham is considered as the progenitor of the "chosen people," and the Jews trace their descent from him. Ishmael, son of Abraham and Hagar, who was Egyptian, is regarded by the Mohammedans as their ancestor. He is the ancestor of twelve tribes of desert rangers, according to Genesis 25: 12-18. "Ishmael" is used in a wide sense of the wilder, roving peoples encircling Canaan from the northeast to the south, related to but on a lower rank than the "sons" of Isaac. It is practically identical with the term "Arabia" as used by the Assyrians.

Meaning of "Feet of Clay"

"Feet of clay" comes from Biblical usage. Figuratively it is applied to the more earthly and baser side of human nature. "He has learned that his idol has feet of clay" is said of a person who is disappointed or disillusioned. Daniel II, 32, 33 and 34, says: "This image's head was of fine gold, his breast and his arms of silver, his belly and his thighs of brass, his legs of iron, his feet part of iron and part of clay. Thou sawest till that a stone was cut out without hands, which smote the image upon his feet that were of iron and clay, and brake them to pieces." In the holy city of Benares, India, there is a god whose "feet of clay" are washed each year by the priests after being washed away by the Ganges.

Her Happiest Christmas

FOR many years Marelu had not been exactly happy on Christmas; somehow she had never received the pretty things bestowed upon other girls. "If they all only knew how I have secretly longed for those soft, dainty luxuries," thought Marelu, as she sat before the fireplace, just three days before Christmas.

"There are those kitchen aprons, for instance, from dear old aunt Lucia. Every year, as far back as I can remember, it has always been aprons. I must have almost a dozen by now. Then there is cousin Marie, who has been sending the inevitable handkerchiefs right along, year after year. There must be quite a collection of them, too."

While she had been grateful and thankful for these kind remembrances, she had not been exactly thrilled.

A happy Christmas thought suggested itself to Marelu as she gazed out at the slender icicles shining like silver in the moonlight. "I know what I'll do. I'll start right now and wrap up all these things into pretty Christmas parcels and give them to someone who really needs them."

When Christmas day arrived Marelu started out with her basket brimming full of beautifully wrapped and tied Christmas gifts. Every step she took over the holiday carpet of snow represented a kindly thought of cheer.

"Merry Christmas," she cried, as she handed a bright colored parcel to dear old Linda Larsen.

"The very same to you," said she, with a questioning look of surprise. The next moment she was proudly unwrapping a pair of pretty bath towels. Marlene and Dolly, two little girls around the corner, danced up and down with joy when they saw the snowy handkerchiefs with colored borders. Marelu smiled happily as she left the little girls and proceeded to her next stop. Effie Lynn was overwhelmed with surprise when a gift was handed her. She explained that it had been years since she had received a Christmas present.

After several other interesting calls Marelu started for home. The street lights flashed on and the glimmering Christmas trees joined in the ceremony on all sides of her. As she drew near her own home she stood still a moment and admired the grandeur of the dark pines encircling the house under a white burden of snow. The variations of colors gleaming from the windows seemed to be stretching out to meet the pines.

Inside the house was warmth and joy and Christmas cheer as the family gathered about the Christmas tree, pointed with the star of Bethlehem. Marelu was just in time for the celebration. Bobby had been chosen to read off the names upon the gifts and all eyes were centered upon the huge basket containing them.

"First on the program," shouted Bobby, "is for mother." All wondered what it could be.

"A gorgeous lamp shade," cried mother, as she held it up for all to see.

While still admiring this thing of beauty, Bobby shouted louder than ever, "Something for the governor, himself. Get ready, pop, for your surprise."

"What can the strange package be, for goodness sake?" said father, his eyes popping with interest. "Well, I do declare, if it isn't a golf set. Just what I have wanted for a long time," as he started to examine it.

"Oh boy, hold out your hands and catch, Dot, a ducky package for you, all tied with silver cord. What is it? Open it quick!"

Dot removed the bright red tissue and disclosed a white wool skating outfit.

Marelu had been so absorbed in what the others were receiving that she had forgotten all about herself. For the first time in many years she had received the things she really adored. With a heart full of appreciation and joy, she suddenly shouted, "Merry Christmas!" The others did not quite comprehend the extent of Marelu's enthusiasm, but she, herself, felt, somehow, that this had been the very happiest, merriest Christmas she had ever had.

Decorating for Christmas—

Some Handsome Window and Room Ornaments That Are Inexpensive

WHILE windows may have been decorated for Christmas before now, the arrangements indoors seldom are made until the day before the holiday. The freshness of the beauty is wanted without any diminution. If the novelty has worn off, some of the zest of Christmas is lost. This is so true that many homemakers refuse to have windows trimmed more than a day or so prior to Christmas.

If you happen to be among this latter group, let me suggest that you take sprays of a tree that is misshapen and so very cheap and make a splashing bow of red crepe paper for each and hang one in every front window downstairs. Or have one in each downstairs window that is discernible from the street.

You can dot the spray with holly berries, or whatever you have in addition to the green. Or you can dip popped corn in red stain or dye, and touch the kernels with glue and secure them to the sprays. These notes of red, with their irregular shapes, are intriguing, sometimes being mistaken for berries and sometimes for flowerets.

Bank the mantelpiece over the fireplace where the stockings are hung, using sprays of the green intermingled with holly, mistletoe, pine cones, bayberries, or silvered or other metal painted motifs such as acorns, fine twigs with many fronds, etc. When everything is fixed to your fancy twine a string of wee colored Christmas tree electric lights through the greens. These will look ornamental by day and have a glamor when lighted during the evening.

Baskets filled with greens and dotted with the novelty units lend notes of appropriate Christmas decoration. Any small baskets will do for this purpose. There generally are some about a house, but if not, metal paint or green stain some of the little market baskets such as strawberries, brussels sprouts or tomatoes come in. Make a rope or lengths of paper braid for the handles, painted or stained to match the basket. If a length of picture wire has been wound with the strands of paper rope and braid, these handles will keep their shape when ends have been thrust inside the baskets close to their opposite sides. The handles can be wired or glued to the baskets.

Bouquets of Christmas greens in vases can be put in rooms other than the living room and dining room, and give their beauty of Christmas about the house. Be sure to use vases and bowls that have broad standards lest the uneven weight of the greens tips them over.

His Name Is Kanani—and 58 More Letters

Believe it or not, but—

Here's a lad whose name is Kananinoheaokuuhomeopuukaimanaalohilohiohinokeaweaweulamakaokalani. Just to make it complete, the parents added Reginald Wilhelm.

Mr. and Mrs. Raymond M. Judd of Honolulu, Territory of Hawaii, were not trying for an all-American record when they named their baby. They were just following an old Hawaiian custom. The name is translated "The beautiful aroma of my home at sparkling Diamond Hill is carried to the eyes of heaven."

Oh, yes, they will call him "Joe" for short.

Royal Measles Would Gratify Gracious Mayor

A pendant to the historic incident of Queen Elizabeth and Sir Walter Raleigh is this gem, surely—supplied by Arthur Croxton:

The courtly mayor of a small town in the Midlands had the honor of dancing at some public ceremonial with Queen Alexandra (then princess of Wales). She smilingly warned him that she had just had measles in her household, and that she hoped that she would not give him the disease. Bowing low before her, the mayor answered:

"Your royal highness, I should be most happy to take anything at all from so charming a source."

TRACTION MEANS GROUND GRIP!

GROUND GRIP MEANS "FIRESTONE"!

TRACTION on unimproved roads in bad weather is a problem which has long baffled tire engineers. Sure footing on a muddy football field is also a problem. But during the wet, slippery football season of 1936, thousands of players depended upon the cleats of their shoes to bring them through for the winning play.

During 1937 thousands of car, truck and bus owners will depend upon the rugged rubber cleats of Firestone Ground Grip Tires to pull them through snow, mud, sand, or over any unimproved roads.

The scientific tread of the Ground Grip Tire is so distinctive in design and so unusual in performance that it has become known as "the tire that makes its own road." It is almost unbelievable how these super-traction tires dig in, grip, and pull you through. They are self-cleaning. Chains are not necessary. Equip the rear wheels of your car, truck or bus with a pair of Ground Grip Tires and save time, money and trouble.

If you have not already equipped your tractor and farm implements with Ground Grip Tires do it now—they will save you 25% in time and fuel costs, reduce vibration, and provide greater comfort.

Call on your nearby Implement Dealer, Firestone Tire Dealer, or Firestone Auto Supply and Service Store today. Start now to reap the many advantages of the Firestone Ground Grip Tire—the greatest traction tire ever built!

SYNOPSIS

Kezia Marsh, pretty, selfish and twenty, arrives home in Corinth from school and is met by her older brother, Hugh. He drives her to the Marsh home where her widowed mother, Fluvanna, a warm-hearted, self-sacrificing and understanding soul, welcomes her. Kezia's sister, Margery, plump and matronly with the care of three children, is at lunch with them. Hugh's wife, Dorrie, has pleaded a previous engagement. On the way back to his job at the steel plant founded by one of his forebears, Hugh passes Doc Hiller, a boyhood friend whom he no longer sees frequently because of Dorrie's antipathy. Fluvanna Marsh wakens the next morning from a dream about her late husband, Jim, whose unstable character she fears Kezia has inherited. Ellen Pendleton comes over. She is an artistically inclined girl who is a distant niece of Fluvanna's. She happily tells Fluvanna she has become engaged to Jerry Purdue. Ellen fears that her father and mother, Gavin and Lizzie, will not approve the match. Hugh and Dorrie go out to the Freeland Farms to dance with their friends, Cun and Joan Whitney. Whitney, who has been out of work, has a new position. Cun and Dorrie dance together and then disappear for a while. Dancing with Joan, Hugh is amazed to find her in tears. Apparently she has some secret worry over her husband, Cun. When Ellen and Jerry speak about their engagement to Ellen's parents, Lizzie is disagreeable until Jerry sympathizes with her imagined ailments. The matter is left pending. Unexpectedly Hugh has to visit a neighboring city on business. Returning home to ask Dorrie to accompany him he finds her telephoning. In confusion she quickly hangs up without saying good-by. She finally agrees to accompany him. They spend a delightful day and Hugh is happy. At a family party, Kezia encounters Jerry. Ellen is disturbed when Jerry is absorbed by Kezia. Kezia goes out of her way to charm Jerry. Fluvanna is concerned about Kezia, who is evasive about dates she has been having at night. She muses over the resemblance of Kezia to her late husband, recalling how temperamental, moody and improvident he had been. She recalls the tragic picture of his death—how after drinking and gambling to excess he is faced with financial ruin, how he tries to force her to mortgage her resources to pay his debts and threatens her with a gun, how in a struggle for its possession he is fatally wounded. Overworked and worried over business, Hugh stays at the office Saturday afternoon. Doc Hiller advises a let-up. Hugh and Dorrie are dinner guests of the Whitneys.

"A perfect dinner," commented Hugh. "Jonny, you make cooking an art!"

"It should be," she said blithely. "We practice it enough."

"Notice that vinegar for the salad?" asked Cun. "She makes it in June from the rose petals—much milder than any other."

"And the strawberries?" Dorrie exclaimed.

"Fall bearing ones."

"I never see them. Where did you get them?"

"From the Mennonite farmer who brings me eggs each Saturday. There's a settlement of them a few miles south. They're very unworldly — so carefully honest about every penny."

"Religion means everything to many people," said Joan.

Cun settled in his chair more comfortably. His eyes sparkled, his florid skin was pinker than usual. "I grant you that, Jonny. But I can't see it. Too many hymn-singing hypocrites in church when I was young . . . blasted my youthful illusions!"

Joan looked at him steadily. "You don't believe in anything, do you?"

"I've never felt the need of it. Life has been pretty good to me and when it's over, I want it to be over!"

Dorrie's eyes were applauding. "My sentiments, Cun. Religion is the refuge of a defeated soul."

"Exactly," nodded Cun.

"A person has been overthrown by life, and prays for a heaven which will be a wish-fulfilment of the things missed on earth."

"Then there is no reality in religion? Merely wish-fulfilment?" questioned Joan. "So glad to have it explained—I never understood."

Dorrie took no notice of her irony. She went on: "It's good for some individuals. We have a case in our family—Hugh's mother. Oh, don't look shocked! Your mother isn't sacrosanct, is she? I'm only saying it before Joan and Cun . . . Hugh's mother has had a tremendous help from religion."

"Then I would say there is reality in it," Hugh defended. "How can one tell there is not? It's supposed to be experienced—a spiritual adventure which convinces people!"

Joan jumped up from the table. "Gracious! Weren't we stupid to get in an argument over religion when it always ends in a yammer? Cun, tell Hugh about your new work while I clear away."

"We went over that the last time," answered Cun. "What do you say we do the dishes for Joan? Wash and dry 'em?"

"That's a valuable idea," approved Hugh.

"Dorrie, you're always getting out of work—oh, yes, you are!—you can begin washing the glasses. Jonny will give you an apron to cover up that creation you're wearing!"

"Oh, Cun, Dorrie will spoil her manicure!" said Joan.

But Dorrie entered into it gayly, took the dishpan, filled it with hot water, sprinkled some soap chips in it. "Bring on the glasses."

"Wash 'em clean, my girl, or you'll get fired!"

"Wash them clean?" Dorrie laughed as she rinsed a goblet and handed it to him to dry. "Don't you trust me, Cun?"

"No, not now."

Joan and Hugh were clearing the table, going back and forth between the kitchen and the dining-room. When Hugh came through with some plates, Cun and Dorrie were talking in low voices. She said at once in louder tones, "Get a dry towel, nitwit. That's just sopping"—the quick abandonment of a secret conversation for a casual one. But they were always chaffing one another, Hugh remembered.

Dorrie emptied the dishpan, glanced at the clock. "Twenty minutes—no more! Who said I didn't know how to work?"

"Don't misquote," said Cun, his eyes merry. "'Always getting out of it,' I said."

"That for you!" She snapped her fingers at Cun. "Hugh will tell you I'm a thoroughly efficient person. Come on, Joan, let's go upstairs and repair the damage. Hurry, before I get any more mean cracks from this husband of yours! Does he bully you this way?"

"Most of my waking hours, eh Joan?" said Cun. "She's too loyal to give me away."

"Don't count on me too much," said Joan over her shoulder as she followed Dorrie out of the room.

Hugh rather enjoyed the bridge game. He and Joan had unusual luck, won rubber after rubber. Dorrie seemed absent minded and several times made rather obvious misplays. Late in the evening she denied Cun's heart bid with one of spades, went back to spades when Cun raised his heart bid, and was promptly doubled. The spades were bunched in Joan's hand and with the double she drew, she went down disastrously.

"Jonny, You Make Cooking an Art."

"If you'd led clubs last, you'd have saved two tricks," said Cun. "Forget they were high?"

"So they were. Sorry, Cun, I played it like a——"

"Nitwit?" he suggested. "It's all right. Your game is usually so cracking good you're entitled to an occasional lapse."

Hugh looked at his watch. "Eleven-thirty," he reminded them.

"Come on, Hugh," said Joan, "we'll go out and fix up a nightcap, get some cheese and crackers—the duty of the winners."

Hugh followed her to the kitchen, lounged against the wall while Joan opened segments of cheese wrapped in silver paper. He admired her deft movements as she went from cupboard to table, quick but not brisk, light but sure. He thought her eyes were like those wild asters on the dining table, smoky blue. And her lashes a thick fringe of black. Nice eyes, Joan had.

He ventured a compliment. "You're looking yourself tonight."

She paused, smiling. "Meaning ——?"

"Yes—very," he said emphatically.

"Thanks."

The kitchen was a shining place of cream-colored walls and woodwork, red tile linoleum, and red voile curtains. He opened the door to the porch. "Do you eat out here often?"

"Yes, all our breakfasts. If we pull down the shades on the left side we're hidden from our neighbors. We can see our garden, watch the birds visit the cement pool."

"I wonder if I could build something like this on our place. I've always wanted to eat outside."

"Come over and have breakfast with me some morning."

"I will some morning when Dorrie isn't up and the maid is having a vacation."

"Let it be soon then. Not many more weeks of summer." Her white teeth gleamed in her dark face as she smiled this challenge. Her eyes, so burningly alive, lingered on him with something thoughtful and caressing, something evocative in their depths. She turned away.

Visiting In The United States

Dr. Sverre Norborg, one of Norway's foremost theologians and preachers, and also known to American churches as the executive secretary of the World's Sunday School Convention held in Oslo, Norway, in 1936, is visiting the United States.

Dr. Norborg is the author of several religious books published in the Scandinavian countries.

His first book in the English language came from the press of Augsburg Publishing House in Minneapolis, Dec. 10. This book bears the title, "What is Christianity?" The preface contains this remarkable statement: "This book comes as a greeting from the Unknown Europe, living its rich and victorious life whatever befalls it."

The rink was, this past week flooded a number of times and is now in fine shape to skate on. The youngsters are doing double time enjoying the rink.

Roseau—Records were established in a new field when a Roseau physician laid claim to the honor of having cut out the largest tonsils, a big handful. The tonsils, which are the size of eggs, it is said, are the largest ever taken out of living man, but the patient from whose throat they were cut experienced no greater discomfort during the operation than do other persons.

MERRY CHRISTMAS

WHAT two words on human tongue are more heart-warming than those! They not only represent a friendly greeting, but in them are summed up the whole spirit of the Yuletide—brightness and laughter, joy of living and joy of giving, health and happiness, peace on earth and good will to all men.

It is a greeting which we will hear often in this community of ours during these happy days of the Christmas season. We will hear it on our streets, in our stores, along our country roads and in our homes. For ours is a friendly community and nowhere is that friendly greeting more sincere. It is not possible, however, for each of us to say "Merry Christmas!" to everyone and thus complete the happy circle of Yuletide good cheer.

But there is one who has that rare privilege, one who has been a welcome visitor at the firesides of the homes in this community throughout the year and who now claims the right to be the first to wish you joy at this joyous time. That one is your Home Paper.

So your Home Paper carries from you to all the community and from all the community to you, this friendly greeting:

MERRY CHRISTMAS!

—THE PUBLISHERS

Arrangements have been made throught the county so that persons desiring to turn over used clothing to the poor may do so by leaving them at the Sewing project in the Village Hall. This is part of a countrywide project sponsored jointly by the Boy Scouts and Welfare Dept. All the clothing collected will be fixed up at the sewing projects and given to the poor for use during the winter It is especially hoped that heavy outdoor clothing can be gotten as the greatest need exists for this kind of clothing.

By VIRGINIA VALE

TAKE the word of a New York hairdresser for the fact that Mrs. Clark Gable "doesn't look ten years older than anybody, much less Clark!" Mrs. Gable dropped in the first time, wearing red, and a beautiful fur coat, and captivated the entire establishment with her good looks and charm.

Incidentally, on her husband's recent trip to New York, it was said that he left the studio somewhat in doubt about just where he was going when he departed for New York — the general impression seems to have been that he was just going on a hunting trip. Another version was that he hoped to settle once and for all the matter of a divorce. However, nothing apparently happened. Clark spent a few days in New York and then went back to Hollywood.

You can't accuse Fredric March of high-hatting his old friends. Long ago, when he was a young actor just trying to get somewhere on the stage, he lived with two other chaps who also were just trying to get along in their professions. One of them was better off than the others so he paid the rent and bought meals.

Fredric March

The meal-buyer is up against hard times now. Fredric March isn't. If he were like some of our stars, he'd conveniently forget the past. But when he's in New York he looks up that old friend and nobody'd know by his actions that he'd climbed to the top of the ladder. In other words, he deserves the highest tribute that electricians and carpenters and other workmen around the movie studios can pay a man, "He's regular."

After his magnificent performance in "Winterset" Burgess Meredith deserves the best that's going. And "Winterset," by the way, is a magnificent picture, though there's one scene that may keep you awake, shuddering, for nights and nights.

Jessica Dragonette, who's been singing on the air practically ever since there's been any broadcasting, is branching out for herself with a new weekly series of half-hour musical programs each Wednesday night from nine-thirty till ten, on CBS. First time she's been on a coast-to-coast series, after ten years of radio work.

Do you listen to the Kate Smith programs, on which various unsung heroes and heroines appear, tell their story, and then receive votes from listeners-in? If you heard seven-year-old Mary Louise McCroskey and liked her you'll be glad to hear that she was voted for by 215,000 people, and received the weekly award of $500.

Loretta Young fell in love with the beautiful costumes that she wore in "Ramona," and couldn't bear to have them returned to the wardrobe room, to be cut up and made over. So she bought them, had them remodeled slightly—and now has four new evening dresses.

At last Jack Oakie, that gay comedian of the screen, has his heart's desire — a master of ceremonies job on the air. It's odd that he hasn't been signed up before, for he is one of the few comedians who are as good on the air as they are on the screen — you've probably heard some of his guest performances; he was on with Bob Burns while Bing Crosby was in Honolulu. He got the idea for this new program from his work in "College Rhythm." He's going to be a college president, but hasn't announced yet just what that will lead to. He's admitted that he'll have "guest professors"—Al Jolson, Eddie Cantor, Burns and Allen and others.

You'll see Barbara Stanwyck dancing in 20th Century Fox's "Banjo on My Knee"; she used to do it for a living, starting in the "Follies" . . . ## Showing Three New Styles

YOU who sew-your-own will be more enthusiastic than ever after making realities of these three new styles. Each is truly a delightful fashion and best of all there's something for every size in the family—from the "little bear" right on up.

Pattern 1997 is the smartly styled smock that probably has an option on a little portion of your heart right now. Fair enough, follow the dictates of your heart and you can't go wrong. This little wardrobe nicety will serve you becomingly and well. It will add to your comfort too. Make it of broadcloth, gingham, sateen or chintz for prettiness and easy maintenance. There is a choice of long or short sleeves and the shiny gold buttons offer just the sort of spicy contrast one likes in informal apparel. Available for sizes 32, 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44. Size 34 requires 3½ yards of 39 inch material.

Pattern 1204—This new day frock for sizes 36 to 52 is the final word in style and charm in any woman's language. To don this flattering fashion is to step blithely into the realm of high fashion. The soft feminine collar is most becoming and it serves as an excellent medium for contrast. The sleeve length is optional. Slender lines are the main feature of the skirt and a very pleasant effect results from the wide and handsome flare. Satin or sheer wool would most assuredly win your friends' approval and perhaps just a little of their envy. This pattern is designed for sizes 36, 38, 40, 42, 44, 46, 48, 50 and 52. Size 38 requires 4⅝ yards of 39 inch material. Less with short sleeves. The collar in contrast requires ⅞ yard.

The adorable little number for Miss Two-To-Eight, Pattern 1994, is surely without competition in the way of downright intrigue. It's the essence of youthfulness with a lot of grown-up technique added to make it a crackajack. Why not do things up right and cut this model twice—panties too, naturally—using sheer wool for the "best" occasion frock and gingham or seersucker for school, play and all-purpose use? Pattern 1994 is available in sizes 2, 4, 6 and 8 years. Size 4 requires 2½ yards of 39 inch material plus ¾ yard of bias binding for trimming.

Send for the Barbara Bell Fall and Winter Pattern Book containing 100 well-planned, easy-to-make patterns. Exclusive fashions for children, young women, and matrons. Send fifteen cents in coins for your copy.

—14—

Hugh stood still. He was conscious of something different in Joan. An unwilling response tingled through him. "Shall I crack the ice now?" he asked calmly.

Sunday Joan was standing close beside him, dangerously close. "Hugh."

He laughed nervously. "What's got into you, Jonny?" He kissed her lightly on the cheek; his arm went around her with a little squeeze. Then he pushed her away.

She came back with the swift light movement of a bird. Her smoky eyes burned with tenderness. "Would I be so hard to love?"

"Of course not."

"Then why——?"

"Lots of reasons, Jonny. You know them as well as I do. Be a good girl—step back to the table. Dish out the crackers—do something."

She stood still and very close to him. She said in a small distinct voice, "There are no good reasons."

He stared at her. A hollow something beat in his brain like the blow of a mallet. One . . . two . . . three . . . crack. One . . . two . . . three . . . He wet his lips and was suddenly conscious of the taste of brass in his mouth.

"Explain."

"Don't you know?"

He turned his heavy gaze on her. "I don't know——" He paused stupidly.

She went to the kitchen cupboard, and with trembling hands began to set out some glasses.

He followed her, seized her arm. "What do you mean? You'll have to tell me."

She fell back from him. "No, I won't tell you."

His eyes held hers and in their shining fearful depths, he read the destroying truth.

He pushed open the swinging door to the hall. The soft chenille rug gave no sound of his footsteps. He felt as if he were a soldier going to meet a destined bullet. The lights were dim in the living-room; the card table was vacated. He stood in the door for a moment, then went back very quietly.

He leaned up against the wall of the kitchen. His face was swept with agony.

It burned like acid, and it froze like ice. He had seen it with his own eyes. If someone had told him, he would have explained it away to meet the desirous need of his soul to believe in her. But he had seen it—Dorrie and Cun were lovers.

Joan looked at him compassionately. "Poor Hugh," she murmured.

It came upon him in black waves that this knowledge was the thing he had been fleeing from. He had turned his face away; denied the possibility to his soul. A secret voice had whispered that her coldness had a reason . . . He had refused to listen.

Finally he said in a croaking, foggy voice, "You knew it that night at Freeland Farms."

"When I cried? Yes, I was so sorry for us both. I hoped when he was working, things would be different——"

"How long?"

"I don't know. It must have started early last winter—January, perhaps. I wasn't sure who it was until that week—the day or two before Freelands. But I thought you must know by this time . . . they're so very . . . they don't care any more."

She had known about it, yet had been able to entertain them—at Cun's insistence, probably—come to their house, act a part . . . "living for the day." Her courage was beyond him. He took out his handkerchief to wipe his dripping forehead. His hand trembled. He slumped into a kitchen chair. A groan escaped him.

Joan poured something in a glass. "Here, drink this. It will do you good. You're so white."

He lifted it to his lips and the odor of the liquor sent a violent and uncontrollable nausea shuddering through him. He rose and plunged toward the back door. "Sick, Joan . . . sick . . . going out."

In a few minutes she heard his car drive away.

CHAPTER VII

Hugh fumbled through the fog to the street and climbed into his car. He drove automatically, stopped at through streets, shifted gears, rolled into his own driveway and garage. He shut off the engine, sat humped over the wheel, his head on his arms. If death would come now . . . suddenly . . . end this chaotic desolation! The agony was more terrific than any physical pain.

He went into the house, dragged two suitcases from a closet. He reeled as he deposited them on the bedroom floor. He sat down on the bed, shaking with weakness. Presently he got up, opened a drawer of the chiffonier, lifted a pile of shirts.

A car stopped in front of the house; he heard light footsteps on the porch. Dorrie came running up the stairs.

Her hair was blown a little; her blue scarf trailed over one shoulder. "I must say that was a queer thing to do—go off without saying a word," she said, angry excitement in her eyes. "What was the matter?" Her voice had a raw edge, unlike her usual tone.

When he did not answer, she went to the dresser and picked up a comb, ran it through her hair. "Even if you were sick—Joan said you were—why did you go off with the car? How do you suppose I felt before Joan?"

She was thinking he was the same person as before dinner—going to carry it off as if she were the offended one. Now—even now. That was what she had been doing right along, making him feel at fault, because she was so horribly at fault herself. He was beginning to understand. Everything that had puzzled him . . . And the understanding poisoned his soul.

She must have seen his white face in the mirror for she turned suddenly. She saw the suitcases, the open drawers, the expression on his face. Arrested, she scarcely breathed as she stared at him. Comprehension blanched her face. "What—does this mean?"

When he did not speak, she said in quivering low voice, "Hugh?"

She caught the dresser behind her with both hands. Her tone curled and lashed. Presently she said, "You were spying on us!"

He gave a laugh that was like a sob. "Do you call it that?"

"Well, now you know, what of it?" she flung out. "What of it? . . . . Am I any worse than a hundred women you can name?"

A hundred women. She was implying there was no such thing as virtue—fidelity. All their friends in the same treacherous business. Flimsy defense.

"And you—what about you?" She was smiling scornfully. "You can't make me believe you're as lily white as you're painted! . . . What about that stenographer you've had so long? . . . And you and Joan getting clubby? . . . And that Ellen Pendleton whom you kiss each time you see her at your mother's? And——"

"You're lying, and you know it."

She looked sullen. She began again, heaping blame upon him. "Even if you haven't met anyone you care for, I should think you'd be understanding and sorry for me if I have! . . . Do you think we could help it? Don't you suppose we struggled against it? Tried not to see each other, hoping we'd get over it? . . . And didn't I try to make you leave this town? But you wouldn't go!"

"So you care for him," Hugh repeated dully.

Her long green eyes looked at him with cruelty and contempt. She threw back her head with a little gesture, and the words came out with a passionate ringing stress: "Care for him? . . . I love him—love him!"

A sword ran through him . . . two swords—with the agonizing knife thrust of her repeated words. She loved Cun—not him. Love. The word was hideous.

He put his arm weakly across his eyes. "Please—no more—just now."

But Dorrie was not finished. She went on in a tangential torrent of reproach. "I'm sick of all your relatives and thousand cousins telling me what a prize I've won in you, their fair-haired boy!—as if I were nothing! And you've humiliated me—yes, you have! . . . It's your fault—yours only! I meant to be a good wife to you—intended to be—but all you think of is that old business! . . . You never understood——"

"Shut up!" he thundered suddenly. A vein was livid across his temple.

She stared at him. Then threw herself into a chair and began to cry, long, tearing sobs that set his raw nerves quivering.

Grimly he emptied the drawers, throwing things to the floor, then crowding them into the cases. He snapped them shut, lifted them and started out.

She flew to the door, barred it with her outspread arms. "Hugh—don't go."

"Stand away," he ordered impatiently.

"Not tonight. Hugh—don't go. Tomorrow . . . "

"I'm going."

He looked at her with set face. "There is no place for me in this house—haven't you told me?"

"I said wild things . . ."

"That have been in your mind. Waiting to be said."

"I didn't realize——"

"You talk about understanding—well, I didn't. I thought of you as something special, rare, and enchanting. My life revolved around you—you knew it—I told you. I never saw you as you really are—common, vulgar and selfish. When you said things that disturbed me, I thought it was caprice. I worked hard to make more money to give it to you, because I loved you. No one could have made me believe this thing if I hadn't seen you in his arms, seen your filthy caresses . . ." He choked, turned his head aside. "Now let me go!"

Making a Choice—

Independence and Loneliness or Dependence With Ties of Affection

TO MOST persons there comes sometime in their lives the opportunity for a choice between independence and loneliness or ties and affection. The wise mature person thinks long before choosing the former above the latter. There are many young people, however, who feel so sure of themselves and their ability to "get along all right" that they are irked by the least restraint. They throw it off, only to discover later in life that affection is worth the curtailing restraint and dependence entailed. Companionship has been their portion up to the time of their decision that dependence is what they must have, at any cost. They have no idea of what loneliness means.

Separation.

The adult who is separated from his family because of distance, domestic estrangement, or who has outlived the other members, realizes to the full what it means to be alone. It is when estrangement causes the separation that there are times when the aloneness is bearable or agreeable, but these times are interrupted by hours when the feeling of loneliness creeps over him (or her), and companionship, though with but a small degree of affection, is craved.

Individuality.

Human nature is so constituted that people cannot live in the same atmosphere and always see eye to eye. There is wisdom in this plan. Individuality would be quelled if what any person thought (however beloved) could always be accepted without dissent by those around him (or her). Nor can actions of even those dear to us, invariably meet with our approval, whether expressed or unexpressed.

It is when we learn to permit personal differences without censure that companionship, in the home or out of it, develops best. Even when children are young, they must be allowed a modicum of such freedom or when older they will long to break away, and if they do then there is loneliness in store for the youth, and sadness left in the home.

Divorce.

Married couples, when they contemplate divorce, have the choice between independence plus loneliness, or dependence, each on the other with affection restored, or remaining less than could be desired. It may be there is incompatability, but it should be remembered that no two persons, married or single, can live together under the same roof and always be congenial. However, this does not signify that at heart affection is gone. Separation means loneliness for one or both of them.

Families.

Within a family there is sure to be some dissension at times—young folk may quarrel and adults dispute. But when these times are over, the ties of affection, the associations that intertwine, and the fabric of their lives so closely woven together, should prove a firm foundation for continued companionship. The door to loneliness should remain barred.

Safetygrams

BY FRED W. BRAUN
The Safety Man

Some drivers feel that their ability to get out of a tight spot is a demonstration of skill.

Reckless driving is not a demonstration of skill. A driver may get a thrill from getting out of a tight spot by quick and expert handling of his car. He should not boast about it or get "cocky" from this experience.

A good driver never gets in a tight spot. He is always careful on the approach to intersections, school, crossroads, and other places where there may be a possibility of meeting other drivers.

The anticipation of an accident at these possible spots makes for careful driving. It's smart to be careful.

Apple Sauce

WHAT'S sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander—if the sauce happens to be apple sauce. Men like it so well that you'd think it was Adam instead of Eve who first put apples on the menu. But apple sauce can be the most tempting of dishes or the most insipid. It all depends on the apples used in making it. Strangely enough it's not the roundest, reddest apples that have the fine flavor when cooked.

Canners have an advantage over the housewife. Not only do they know just which apples make the most delicious apple sauce; they grow them to specifications. They plant and cultivate enormous apple sauce orchards—that is, orchards in which the whole crop is destined never to go to market, but to be made into apple sauce on or very near the spot. The right apples always result in the right flavor. Using canned apple sauce saves not only time but uncertainty.

Apple Sauce Recipes

There are many ways of serving apple sauce besides the two most familiar ones; as a sauce with meat or as a dessert with cream and gingerbread. Here's a recipe for an apple sauce pie which doesn't take long to make, and the men of your family will pronounce it superb.

Apple and Cream Cheese Pie: Season the contents of one No. 2 can of apple sauce with a quarter of a teaspoon cloves, and pour into a crust. Dot with one tablespoon butter and bake—for ten minutes in a 450 degree oven and for twenty minutes in a 350 degree oven. Cool. Beat three-quarters of a cup cream, add one cream cheese which has been forced through a sieve and a few grains of salt, and pile on the pie, which should be served very cold.

Apple Fluff: Beat one cup heavy cream. Add a quarter of a cup confectioner's sugar. Add contents of one No. 2 can apple sauce. Fold in half a cup chopped nuts and half a cup chopped dates. Chill. This serves eight.

—15—

"Not tonight. I won't let you."

"I can't stay here."

"Yes, you can. Let us talk things over quietly—decide what is best to be done."

Best to be done? What was best to be done?

"It's so late—where will you go? Get your mother up at this hour . . . or a hotel? Publish the whole thing . . . !"

The roots of habit and of home are mighty in their strength, sturdy in resisting an attempt to break away. But he could not occupy the bed so close to her, knowing—— His mother? What explanation could he offer? . . . It would have to be a hotel! He reached for the knob of the door behind her back.

But she had read his wavering of a second. "The other room, Hugh—the guest room! You can sleep there!"

Sleep? She thought he could sleep? At length he gave an unwilling gesture of assent. Dorrie hurried in to turn on the lights, remove the silken coverlid. She hated the idea of change, he thought; wanted to go on without definitely facing the issue. Something would have to be done. What—he did not know. Perhaps the morrow would bring some clarity.

Dorrie turned at the door before leaving. "Does Joan know?"

He nodded.

"She does?" She bit her lip. "Then I suppose she told you."

He did not answer.

She said with a curious venom, "I'm sure she did—and it was pretty mean of her, when she knew how it would hurt you!"

Hugh stared at her.

Her door closed.

The darkness folded the room round, an aching evil darkness. An iron band tightened around Hugh's skull, and his mouth seemed filled with the taste of brass. The second time that night, that taste. Odd thing. He had never had it before! . . . His heart pounded until his chest ached, and his nerves were as tense as fiddle strings.

Over and over the scenes, the words repeated themselves—Joan . . . Dorrie and Cun . . . Dorrie. They would not let him alone. And each time the act was played, he became aware of sinister implications, ghastly ogre faces that leered and mocked at him, suggested details, whispered: "Don't you remember that time——?"

Joan had said "they don't care any more." Then she meant that others must know, and he, like the fool in the snickering fable, was the last to learn what was going on under his own roof.

Then like an imperious flood it came over him, distaste and longing mingled in its waves, his desire for this woman who had betrayed him, for the sweet, dear flesh which had seemed so inalienably his own. He despised himself for his passion, but he could not quell it or master it.

At length the chattering of robins and sparrows, the crescendo and diminuendo of passing cars, the sound of the maid going out to early church, warned him that no matter how calamitous, he must take up the burden of the day.

Dorrie had loved Hugh when she married him, but she had never been in love with him. He offered a mode of life much pleasanter and more dignified than her wanderings with her mother before she met Hugh.

Her marriage pleased her at first. She rejoiced in the background of the Marsh family in Corinth, faintly boasted of it in letters to friends, liked the novelty of having a home of her own and an indulgent husband who could not do enough for her. Later when she became bored with the conventionalities of Corinth, which was so much like the Harrisville of her youth, she sternly told herself she was lucky—lucky; that Hugh was far too good for her.

Fluvanna puzzled her at first. She was not the traditional mother-in-law. Could anyone so generous, so wisely kind, so free from envy or criticism exist? She suspected a pose at first, but came to recognize that the circumstances of Fluvanna's life had left her beautifully self-contained, instead of bitter and broken. Dorrie, who had expected to patronize or be patronized, looked up to her, wanted her approval, praise, and did little unexpected kindnesses now and then to deserve it.

When she met the Whitneys, she had found in them a congenial couple for bridge, conversation, or an outing. Joan was clever; Cun a lively companion. Cun couldn't talk of books or plays or music, and swept away the idea of their having significance for anyone else with a magnificent ridicule. This amused her, for she knew it came from his naive desire to have the world he knew—that of virility, of smart achievements in salesmanship, of golf, of success in a material way—supreme before the world of the intellect.

Cun was always decorous in his manner toward her, but secretly she recognized a quality that moved her. "You're my own kind!" Coul had said to her roughly the last time she saw him. "You can't get away from it for all your airs! You understand me—because you're like me!" He had seized and kissed her until she pushed him away, filled with loathing and fascination.

One December day Cun had dropped by with a silver tray which Joan had borrowed, and lingered to talk by the crackling fire. Outside, it was a gloomy, menacing day, and it had seemed magically warm and cosy in the dim room. The talk slipped into easy rhythm and laughter, harmless talk of cars and hunting trips, and the merits of various bridge systems. Then a silence fell and something fluid and stealing passed between them. She looked at him and he was smiling at her. She recognized the light in his eyes and dropped her own. A disturbance urgent as the vibration from a humming wire ran up the inner part of her arm. She took the hearth broom and swept back some ashes, averting her face.

"Not Tonight. I Won't Let You."

Cun rose to go, extended his hand. "Good-by, nice of you to be home."

"Wasn't it? I'm that way—nice," she said carelessly.

He kissed her. It was not the hasty self-conscious kiss of a bumpkin, yielding to a furtive desire, but a deftly slow meeting of his lips with hers.

They had both laughed with soft understanding and self-excuse—a kiss?—what was a kiss between friends? She rebuked herself afterward for her response. But she found herself looking forward to the next meeting with a reluctant excitement.

He brought her an illustrated weekly. The others were near by. "This is the advertisement I told you about. Pretty clever, eh?" Then in a tone low enough for only her to hear: "What you do to me is worse than a bank failure!"

"Very clever—ad." She hummed and moved away. She snubbed him several times after that and felt very moral about it. But with Cun in his place, life lost a certain zest.

She was in a dull mood that January day when Cun called. "Hello, how do you like this blizzard? . . . Don't you need a man who is out-of-work to clean off your sidewalks?" Then in a lower voice: "Please let me come over and talk a while! Joan went down town and I'm as lonesome as the last passenger pigeon!"

She gave her consent. After all it was a kind thing to do—even Hugh would approve. Cun was feeling down. No job—poor fellow! These were the excuses her conscious mind gave, while the inner mind sent her upstairs to change her dress, spray her hair with perfume, in riotous excitement.

"Cun, you mustn't sit on the arm of my chair! Sit over there where you belong—across from me. . . . I'll make you shovel snow if you don't behave! . . . I know my hair is pretty . . . and I know I'm beautiful. I've been told it a hundred times! . . . Now are you going to be sensible—good friends—or shall we have to stop seeing each other altogether? . . . Please don't! . . . I hate to be touched . . . I'm not seductive . . . This old dress? Just an afternoon thing which you said you liked once! . . . But I didn't put it on for you . . . Why do you say that? Aren't you taking a great deal for granted?" All weak defenses. Words which did not deceive him, for her tone did not match her sentences. He knew he was evoking a response in her, read it in the slurred uneasiness of her voice, in the deep sparkle of her eyes. It was a game which he had played many times before but never for such quarry.

Part Siamese Twins in Daring Operation

London, England.—A surgical operation which is said successfully to have separated "Siamese twins"—two infant white girls in Africa—is described in the British Medical Journal by Dr. D. W. McLaren of the Colonial Medical Service in Nigeria.

He relates how two girls were joined together by a circular funnel of tissue measuring one and one-half inches and two inches thick. The operation was performed on June 16, when the twins were six months old.

FAMED SMALL CASE OF 1919 UP AGAIN

Link Strangle Plot With Vanishing of Millionaire.

Toronto, Ont.—An alleged strangulation plot was linked with the mysterious disappearance of Ambrose Small, multi-millionaire Toronto theater owner, object of a world-wide search since he vanished in 1919.

Roy Greenaway, Toronto Daily Star reporter, a witness in the supreme court action to prevent distribution of Small's $2,000,000 estate, testified the late Mrs. Theresa Small, widow of the theater magnate, told him a few details of the alleged "plot" in an interview six years ago.

"She said she thought a fight over money led to a scuffle which accidentally killed him," the reporter testified.

He added that Mrs. Small mentioned the name of John Doughty, Small's secretary, in connection with the fight. Doughty, on his return to Toronto a year after Small's disappearance, was charged with the theft of $100,000 worth of securities owned by Small and was sentenced to five years in the penitentiary.

Another witness, Frederick Osborne, former caretaker of the Grand Opera house, testified that shortly before Small disappeared Doughty asked him how he would like to have $20,000 and told him to send his family away while the plan to strangle Small was carried out.

Osborne said he quit his job, refusing to have anything to do with Doughty's plotting.

Thomas Shields testified that on the night of Dec. 2, 1919, he went to the basement of the Grand Opera house and heard "quite an argument" between Doughty and Small near by.

"Doughty used terrible language," Shields said. "He threatened to throw Small into the furnace."

He said he associated the incident with Small's disappearance a day later, but that he did not tell any one except Jimmy Cowan, Grand Opera house manager, who told him: "Mind your business. Don't get mixed up in this."

Small's estate went to his widow several years after he was officially declared dead. Mrs. Small died last October, leaving most of the estate to the Roman Catholic church and charitable institutions.

The present court action, based on a claim that Mrs. Small obtained the estate by fraud and other illegal means, was brought by Mary Florence Small, sister of Ambrose Small.

Thief Makes Off With Ton of Dinosaur Footprints

Holyoke, Mass. — Some of Holyoke's famous dinosaur tracks, weighing more than a ton and estimated to be millions of years old, have been stolen.

George Pellister, president of the Holyoke Street Railway company opposite whose estate the tracks are situated, reported that a huge slab of rock bearing the well-defined imprints of the prehistoric monsters apparently had been sliced with a compressed air drill and trucked away.

"There apparently have been several thefts," he said, "and the latest probably occurred within a week."

Hailed by scientists as perhaps the finest specimens of the kind in the United States, the Holyoke tracks are extraordinary in that they are located in a populous city. Most such tracks have been found in remote localities, Pellister pointed out.

"The tracks range in size from 4 by 3 inches to 18 by 12 inches," he explained, "and at one point are so numerous that it is possible to gauge the stride of the monster that made them."

The tracks now are under control of the trustees of the Public Reservations of Massachusetts. This organization hopes to raise funds with which the area containing the tracks may ultimately become a state reservation.

Officers Dump Brandy and Ducks Get Drunk

Lodi, Calif.—Abraham Bechthold was fined $150 for the illegal possession of 52 gallons of brandy which officers confiscated and dumped on his property.

When Bechthold returned home after paying his fine, his 100 Mallard ducks were drunk in degrees varying from being asleep, to lying on their backs, staggering around, paddling uncertainly and lying in mudholes.

Home Heating Hints

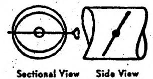
By John Barclay
Heating Expert

How to Check "Chimney Loss," Greatest Waste in Home Heating

WHAT is "chimney loss"? Well, that's a term we heating experts have for heat that goes up the chimney and is wasted.

Yet it's really a simple matter to save money by reducing this loss—convert "chimney loss" to "useful heat," as we call it. Here's the remedy:



Sectional View Side View
Turn Damper in Smoke Pipe

Next time you refuel the fire, move the handle of the turn damper (that disc or plate-like damper inside the smoke pipe) 1-16th of an inch toward the closed upright position. Then, if the fire keeps on burning too freely, turn the damper another sixteenth of an inch. Repeat this operation until you find the correct adjustment—one that will deliver the greatest amount of useful heat with the least "chimney loss."

Once you have found this ideal adjustment of the damper, mark the position on the smoke pipe with a piece of chalk or something that can be plainly seen, and leave the damper set at that mark.

Bear this in mind: The nearer the turn damper is set to the closed position the smaller the "chimney loss" and the greater the volume of "useful heat" that goes to properly heating your home. And, of course, the lower your fuel bills.

Don't Irritate Gas Bloating
If you want to really GET RID OF GAS and terrible bloating, don't expect to do it by just doctoring your stomach with harsh, irritating alkalies and "gas tablets." Most GAS is lodged in the stomach and upper intestine and is due to old poisonous matter in the constipated bowels that are loaded with ill-causing bacteria.
If your constipation is of long standing, enormous quantities of dangerous bacteria accumulate. Then your digestion is upset. GAS often presses heart and lungs, making life miserable.
You can't eat or sleep. Your head aches. Your back aches. Your complexion is sallow and pimply. Your breath is foul. You are a sick, grouchy, wretched, unhappy person. YOUR SYSTEM IS POISONED.
Thousands of sufferers have found in Adlerika the quick, scientific way to rid their systems of harmful bacteria. Adlerika rids you of gas and cleans foul poisons out of BOTH upper and lower bowels. Give your bowels a REAL cleansing with Adlerika. Get rid of GAS. Adlerika does not gripe—is not habit forming. At all Leading Druggists.

THE CHEERFUL CHERUB

Floyd Gibbons Adventurers' Club Hello Everybody!

"Asleep at the Wheel"

By FLOYD GIBBONS
Famous Headline Hunter

HERE'S Fred Bock, whose address is Brooklyn, but whose home is Route 34, or Route 63, or maybe some other route altogether. Fred, you see, drives one of those big transportation trucks that move between one city and another. Those lads might get back to their houses once in a while, but a good part of the time they do their sleeping on the big front seat of a truck parked at the side of the road. That's the sort of lad you have to catch on the fly. But I've nabbed Fred, and here's his story.

On a Thursday morning in November, Fred and his partner Charlie were delivering furniture at various houses in Brooklyn. They went out with a load, delivered it, and finished up about one o'clock in the afternoon. They had some lunch and pulled into the office at two, hoping they were through for the day. But no such luck for Fred. He still had a man-sized job to do that day—and besides that there was a little adventuring to be taken care of. At that stage of the game, though, he didn't know anything about adventuring.

Taking a Load to Washington.

After Fred had settled up his accounts, the manager called him into his office and told him the bad news. There was an immediate delivery to be made in Washington, D. C., and Fred had been elected to do the job.

They loaded the truck and were on their way. Route 1 was to be their home this time. They picked it up in Jersey City and rolled into Philadelphia along about nine o'clock in the evening. Fred and Charlie knew a good lunch wagon in Philly, and they went there for dinner. Back in the truck again, Fred suggested a nap. They had been up since early morning, and both of them were pretty tired.

They lay down on the seat and started to snooze, but not for long. After a brief interval they were awakened by a cop who told them that the main drag of the Quaker City was no lodging house and suggested that they take their big truck out of there. So they started to move.

Fred Was Getting Sleepy.

They threaded their way through the city, and once more they were bowling along the open road through a cold, bleak November night. The wind swept across the fields in fitful gusts and the road ahead seemed to darken. Fred drove on through the night. The hours rolled by and he was getting more and more sleepy. Along about midnight a filmy haze began to cloud his vision.

Says Fred: "The feeling was nothing new to me. It came from staring ahead over long periods, and had happened to me many times before. I knew that the best thing for me to do was pull over to the side of the road for a short rest. I began looking for a convenient parking space, but the minutes fled by without a sign of a place to stop. The road was getting narrower and more gloomy. My eyes seemed to be getting heavy as lead.

"We began to roll down hill. Flickering, fantastic shadows danced across the path of the headlights and the road ahead suddenly inclined in a long, steep, tortuous grade. I looked at Charlie and saw him curled up in the corner of the seat fast asleep. His peaceful repose seemed to tempt me. And then——"

Running Wild Toward a Wall.

And then, suddenly, Fred's eyes were shut and the truck was running wild!

Fred doesn't know how long his eyes were shut or how the truck managed to keep on the road. But something in the back of his brain—some drivers' instinct—brought him wide awake as suddenly as he had fallen asleep. As his eyes came open he saw in the beam of the headlights a sharp, narrow turn in the road and, just at the beginning of the bend, a white concrete wall.

The headlights brought that scene to his eyes with startling clearness. "It didn't take me long to realize what that meant," says Fred. "A narrow bridge spanning—spanning what—was the question. I didn't know, and for a minute it looked as if I never would know."

In the few seconds Fred had been asleep the speedometer had climbed to forty-five. A glance told him that—and then he jammed on the brakes. "But even as I did so," he says, "I knew it would be useless. The bend in the road was too narrow to permit a quick turn with a large truck. I couldn't save myself from crashing into the wall."

Steep Cliff Just Ahead of Them.

Fred took a lightning glance to right and left, searching for a way out. There was a clear space at the beginning of the wall. How long it was—what obstructions he might find in it—he didn't know, but he determined to take a chance and trust to luck that he didn't run into a tree and pile up. He turned his wheels and headed for the clear space. Then, just as his wheels left the road, the headlights showed him what was ahead. There were no trees in his way. There was nothing. The car was plunging toward a steep cliff, at the bottom of which ran the river!

Fred's hand tightened on the wheel. The top of the bank was a scant ten feet ahead, and he knew he would never be able to stop that car. With his whole body tense, he waited for the sickening plunge over the bank—and the end.

And then Fred got the surprise of his life. Suddenly, the truck slowed down as the wheels struck something soft and mushy. It moved another two or three feet and came to an abrupt stop. Fred climbed out of the cab and jumped to the ground, and heaved a sigh of relief and gratitude. The wheels had run into a pile of sand left by the highway patrol. And Fred says: "As I stood there listening to the swish of water far below it certainly seemed to me as if Providence were riding with us that night. For if that pile of sand had been six feet to right or left we would have shot over that clearing and dropped into the river below."

Most Remarkable Ruin

The most remarkable ruin in the West Indies is that of the Citadel La Ferriere at Cape Haitien. Built by King Henry Cristophe to repel a threatened French invasion, it stands on the top of a mountain at 3,000 feet elevation. It has been estimated that nearly half a million tons of building material were used in its construction, every pound of which had to be carried up the precipitous side of the mountain. Ten thousand men were continuously employed in its construction and 20,000 more, it is said, died of exhaustion and hardship.

Naming Old Point Comfort

The name Old Point Comfort dates back to 1607, when three shiploads of English colonists under command of Christopher Newport first sighted the point after a stormy passage from England. With the storm raging a channel was found just off shore, putting the colonists "in good comfort." The place was immediately named Point Comfort, and has remained so through its years as a resort.

The Colosseum in Rome

The Colosseum in Rome was begun by Vespasian, on the site of part of Nero's Gold house, and inaugurated by Titus in A. D. 80. Originally it consisted of three arcaded stories of stone and an upper gallery of wood. Some time in the Third century this gallery was rebuilt of stone. The Colosseum probably seated between 40,000 and 50,000 persons. It is elliptical in plan, with its long axis 615 feet and its short axis 510 feet. Its arena is 281 feet long and 177 feet wide. The top of the stone screen wall is about 160 feet above ground.

Butterflies Cover Continent

Up from the South, where they pass the winter clinging in great masses to the trees, there fly each spring time enormous numbers of Monarch or Milkweed butterflies, laying their eggs as they go and populating the whole of North America as far as Hudson bay with their kind. In the autumn all still surviving collect in great bands and migrate South to begin the cycle anew.—Gas Logic

New Germ-Killing Oil Is Obtained From the Ti-Tree

It Destroys Bacteria and Promotes Healing

SINCE the early days of antiseptic surgery and of crude antiseptics, medical men have been looking for a substance that would kill bacteria—especially the germs that infest wounds—without harming the living tissue of the patient. Such a substance seems to have been found in an essential oil distilled from the Australian ti-tree.

Few people outside Australia had heard of the ti-tree until recently, but now surgeons are beginning to wonder whether the oil is to make their professional dream come true. Tested by the standard method, ti-tree oil was from eleven to thirteen times as effective as carbolic acid of the same strength in killing typhoid bacteria, yet it is non-poisonous.

It Promotes Healing.

Not only is it non-irritating to wounded human tissues, but it is claimed actually to promote the healing of wounds. It is said to dissolve and bring away pus without injuring the healthy tissue.

All other disinfectants and germicides irritate, if they do not destroy, human tissue to some extent, so that their application to a wound must represent a compromise between killing the bacteria and harming the patient. Ti-tree oil is being used by Australian doctors and dentists with remarkable success in treating skin diseases, septic wounds, abscesses, and pyorrhoea, according to the Medical Journal of Australia.

Used Also in Perfumery.

It is a pale lemon-colored, pleasant-smelling oil with an odor resembling nutmeg. This has caused it to be employed in perfumery, but its most refined uses will be in medical and surgical practice.

The chemistry of ti-tree oil has not yet been cleared up, so that it is not known to what the oil owes its peculiar virtue. Ti-tree oil seems, however, to have a more complex composition than many oils originating in Australia, that land of strange plants and animals.

The ti-tree grows only in a belt near the north coast of New South Wales, and its oil is so little known to the world that only one firm in London is handling it.

Interstellar Space May Contain the Element Titanium

CAMBRIDGE, MASS. — Discovery in far-off interstellar space of what is probably ionized gas of the element titanium, a find astronomers say is likely to prove of tremendous significance in learning the content and nature of these nearly vacuous regions, has been reported to the Harvard Observatory by the Mount Wilson Observatory in California.

The find was made by Dr. Walter S. Adams, director of the Mount Wilson observatory, and Dr. Theodore Dunham, a member of the staff, while they were conducting research on the ultraviolet part of the spectrum of the bright star Chi 2 Orionis.

Will Be of Vast Importance.

Harvard astronomers declared, "It seems probable that if the discovery of the interstellar titanium is confirmed it will give information concerning the content and nature of interstellar space that is of more importance than was the discovery of sodium and calcium in nearly empty space."

The star Chi Aurigae also shows the new titanium lines, Dr. Adams and Dr. Dunham reported, and it is probable, they added, that further research on the spectra of the hot stars will reveal the presence of this intervening matter in all directions from the earth.

Glass Wool Is Good Soil for Orchids

WASHINGTON — Hobby and professional interests are combined in a unique fashion by Dr. George W. Morey of the Carnegie Institution of Washington. Dr. Morey is a physical chemist in the institution's geophysical laboratory, specializing in the study of glass and glass-like compounds. As an avocation, he grows orchids.

Recently he has discovered that orchids can be grown to good advantage by rooting them in glass wool, a fluffy material made of matted threads of very fine spun glass, now widely used for a number of purposes, from house insulation to the weaving of fancy fabrics.

Talking to Advantage of Others and Joy to Ourselves in 1937

TALKING is the recognized medium of communication between persons who are together or who, being absent, use a telephone. It is unfortunate having such a marvelous medium at our command that we so often fail to put it to the use worthy of its value. It is possible to send a glow of happiness through the listener when we speak merited words of appreciation. It is possible to solace those in sorrow by words of comfort spoken from the heart. It is possible to make joy doubly gladsome by expressing our happiness in the good fortune of others. Through talking to our children we can spur them on to do fine things, or encourage them in worthy resolves. In short the good we can do by talking in the right spirit is inestimable. By talking in the right way we bring good to others and joy to ourselves.

"Too Much Talk"

It is when we swerve from the best use of the spoken word that we drag it down and harm both ourselves and our hearers. There is an expression "too much talk" which is significant of this very thing. The words speak for themselves, declaring that it would be advisable to cease saying the things we are. It is never said of good words. Of them we could say: Let us have more talk of the same sort, it is needed.

Many Words

Have you ever considered how much is said when derogatory talk is going on? Words are spoken and reiterated over and over again, as if by repetition the unpleasant things would be increased. Unfortunately this is what happens. Unkind or unfriendly conversation, by some perverse twist of human nature, is sure to be repeated, and usually with embellishments. Either the one who repeats it cannot believe her ears, and wonders if anyone else knows about the unfortunate circumstances, or else she finds a strange pleasure in repeating slander. It may be the derogatory words are against someone she dislikes. It may be they are about a total stranger. If the talk was commendatory repeating it would foster fine things. Good things should be given frequent repetition.

Pleasure Giving in 1937

We all could add so much to the pleasure and joy of living during the new year 1937, if we would set a watch on our talk, and by a wishful determination use this great means at our command to help others. It is one of the things that costs nothing and yet which can do such an endless amount of good. It is a way open to all alike.

Rabbits Damage Trees, Shrubs

Rabbit damage to trees and shrubs again threatens to be a winter problem, and Parker O. Anderson, extension forester, University Farm, St. Paul, is endorsing preventive methods which have been recommended by college horticulturists.

An efficient method of protecting orchard trees and shrubs from both rabbits and mice is the placing of wire screens or guards around the tree trunks. A guard should not be less than 4 or 5 inches in diameter and should cover the tree trunk from the ground to the branches. It may be made of ordinary window screening, or if a more permanent gaurd is desired, a heavier screen of hardware cloth with about a quarter-inch mesh can be used. The guards can be made at home by cutting the screen the desired size and fastening the ends together with wire. If no screen is available, guards can be made of burlap or old newspapers. Tar paper or roofing paper should not be used because the action of the sun on the tar generates a gas harmful to the trees.

Mr. and Mrs. Albert Moen entertained the following at their home on New Year's Eve: Mr. and Mrs. Olaf Tollefsrud and family, Mr. and Mrs. Carl Sorenson and family, Mrs. A. Many a youngster who would not think of stealing a ride on the tailboard of a truck will hitch his sled to a car in order to enjoy a thrilling free ride. That's one of the hazards drivers must think about during the next month or two.

It is a great temptation to be big-hearted and let the kids have their fun, but think what it means when you suddenly decide to turn a corner and the sled on which the youngsters are riding sideswipes another car going in the opposite direction. Serious injury or death may be the result.

If you really love children you will discourage this practice. Make it a habit to look back now and then to see that you haven't picked up a couple of joy riders.

Children are care-free, ambitious, and daring. You must protect them.

The afternoon over, she was dizzy with remorse and told herself she was a weak, voluptuous woman—like her mother. She wouldn't see him again.

But she did. It became imperative for her to see him. Frightened, she sent for him to exact his promise to be discreet. It was very easy to allow Cun to take her in his arms while he vowed his discretion . . .

Sometimes she had moods of self-loathing when she met some new evidence of Hugh's affection, or of his mother's confidence in her. Finally these ceased altogether. There were no more struggles to attain the shore; she was swept along by a deep and dangerous current. The stolen love stimulated her whole being, and life was only a frantic waiting until the next meeting could be arranged with some degree of safety.

Her feeling for Hugh progressed through several phases, apology and pity at first, then resentment that he should possess her personality, and finally hatred, where she magnified trifles, seized on each variance of opinion and attitude to bolster up her own position. She had come to the point where she felt it would be a kind of pleasure to have Hugh know. She had often wanted to tell him—watch his smug assurance that he could fill her life, fall away!

The Sunday morning after her declaration to him, she awoke late. The chromium-framed little clock pointed to ten. She looked over sleepily. The bed beside her had not been occupied. Then she remembered and sat up abruptly. Last night?

Joan and Hugh had been in the kitchen. It hadn't seemed long at the time, but perhaps it was a half hour. She and Cun sitting on the love seat at the far end of the dimly lighted room, drugged by caresses, whispering, had been rather oblivious. They were confident that at the sound of returning voices or footsteps they could rise and casually survey a book, a picture. Then Hugh's car had started and he had driven past the windows on the drive.

Cun got up and went out to the kitchen. He came back with his forehead knitted. "Hugh was sick, Joan says. He must have gone home . . . Funny, wasn't it? I wonder . . ."

"What?"

"Could he have looked in the window? No . . . the blinds are down."

"Where is Joan?"

"Out there, sitting in a chair."

"Do you think——?" She felt guilty and uncomfortable.

Then Joan had come in. Hugh had suddenly complained of feeling sick, had gone out the back door. Cun could drive Dorrie over if she felt she must go.

On the way home, Cun, who had recovered his spirits, reassured her. Hugh was too stupid to suspect anything. Honestly, it made him laugh the way she led that fellow around! . . . And probably he hadn't gone home—just to a drug store for some medicine. Why worry? Nothing to worry about. At the worst, she could fix up a story, make him swallow it. He had been with Joan a half a dozen times when she had been uneasy, questioned him. A smart girl, Joan—but gullible.

He'd call her on Monday at the same time. Hugh there—or other company—say "wrong number" and he'd try later.

She rose and putting on slippers and a negligee, ascertained that he was not in the house. His car was gone from the garage.

Her fingers trembled as she dialed Cun's number. She hoped Joan would not answer. In a few seconds she heard Cun's cheerful voice, "Hello."

"Cun, I must see you at once."

He hesitated, then said, "I don't hear you very well."

"Come over. I must see you."

He hesitated again before he replied, "I'm not in the market for a bargain in a car. I expect to run my bus until next spring at least . . I might drop around and look it over, however . . . This year's model and only gone two thousand miles? . . . I'll see you a little later."

He came in less than half an hour. He was freshly shaved, looked carefree, florid and anticipatory. He smiled as he entered the door. "Not here?"

"No, no one is."

He flung his hat on the hall seat and with his arm around her drew her into the living-room.

She faced him determinedly. "Cun, Hugh knows. He saw us last night."

"The deuce he did!"

"He was packing his bags when I got home. I got him to stay the night, but he was gone before I awakened this morning."

Cun whistled.

"Did he take his things?"

"No, they're still here."

He relaxed from his tense attitude, shrugged his shoulders. "I suppose he was furious, looking in on our little party! But he doesn't really know anything . . . You can handle him all right. But it means we'll have to be more careful in the future."

Dorrie felt a nervous doubt of Cun assail her. "But he does know. I told him."

He stared at her unbelieving. "My God, Dorrie, you told him?"

She answered a little sullenly, "I lost my head. I suppose I was tired of all this pretending."

"What was the need of it? This is awkward. Do you realize what the consequences may be? . . Hugh's not a bad fellow. I might like him if he weren't married to you! And there's Joan—and the town — and my company." He seemed positively edgy and there was a queer, critical curve to his lip.

She turned away. "You don't love me!"

He drew her back to him, his eyes still troubled. "I'm out of my head about you, you know it, you dear golden-haired Circe! But just the same——"

"Just the same—what?" Dorrie insisted tautly.

"You've got us into a sweet mess when it wasn't necessary. I'm awfully fond of Joan, as I've often told you; I've outgrown her—kid marriage. But there are—complications. Alimony — you know Joan hasn't a cent. And I'm not making a princely salary."

"Perhaps she won't ask any," said Dorrie hopefully.

"Can't count on that."

Dorrie looked about her. "I'm awfully fond of my home. He let me get just what I wanted. He couldn't take it, could he?" Her voice quavered.

"Afraid he could. Although I imagine Hugh would be awfully decent."

She buried her head on his shoulder. "I don't care about anything—only you," she whispered. "I want to be with you."

His arm tightened about her. Then she felt an unease in his muscles. "This is darn dangerous—my being here," he whispered as he kissed her and released her. "But you're a dangerous woman."

"You Won't Let Me Down, Cun?"

"Going?" she faltered. "But we haven't settled anything. You haven't told me what to do."

He paused on his way to the door. "I'll have to think about it. And by the way, better not call me at the office again. I'll find a way to call you." He picked up his hat.

She felt she could not let him go. She, who was so chary of caresses, felt an irresistible longing to have his arms about her. Her lips trembled with appeal. "You won't let me down, Cun? . . . I've grown to love you so terribly. I thought you'd be glad we were free of all this hiding. You've said so often you'd give anything if I could be your wife."

He answered with vehement ardor, "Darling, I'd lay down my life for you!"

She gave a gasp of relief. She loved every motion of his quick, agile body, loved his gaiety, his carelessness, his fire that kindled in her an ungovernable passion. She would give up her home, her matching rugs and draperies, her Duncan Phyfe furniture, her silver—everything—if only she could have him. "When shall we see each other again?"

He twirled his hat. "Dorrie, you must be a good girl—be sane and sensible."

"Yes—yes?"

"Now you've been rash about Hugh. My advice is to fix it up. He'll overlook it. He's crazy about you." He stopped at the expression on her face. "Love you, precious? . . . Good Lord, yes. But I can't move hand or foot now! . . . We'll not see each other for a while. Perhaps things will blow over."

He was shedding things with his easy optimism, escaping her. She watched him go with a hurt curve on her red lips, and a stony feeling in her chest.

Her thoughs flew here and there like frantic caged birds. Hugh—there was only Hugh.

Movie • Radio

By VIRGINIA VALE

IT WILL be a long time before radio and motion picture executives forget the abdication of ex-King Edward VIII of England. The radio speech he made just before he left England was so moving that everybody is trying to arrange a regular program that will have one-tenth of its appeal.

On all sides they have been hearing of how strongly it affected its hearers. And the movie people would give practically anything for a story half as dramatic and thrilling as the one they followed so eagerly in the newspapers. Of course, they'd like to film a picture based on the real story, but that's forbidden.

Janet Gaynor

Janet Gaynor is going to freelance, after being under contract to one company for so long. She is now making "A Star Is Born," on the Selznick lot, because she liked her part from the moment she read it. So she's going to go on selecting her own roles—with the consent of the companies that happen to be making the pictures — and she's crazy about the idea. Her worshiping public should be, too.

Bing Crosby's radio programs always have such a casual air that they sound as if they were being made up on the spur of the moment. As a matter of fact, they're written by the ace man of one of our biggest advertising agencies. Which all goes to show that it takes experts to make people sound natural.

The new version of "Seventh Heaven" is coming along fine, with Simone Simon in the role that made Janet Gaynor famous overnight, and James Stewart in Charlie Farrell's place. Henry King, who directed "Lloyds of London," (which you'll want to see) is wielding the megaphone.

Speaking of "Lloyds of London" brings up the fact that his work in that picture made a star of young Tyrone Power, son of the famous old actor of that name. Twentieth-Century Fox is giving the young man a stellar part in "Love Is News," with Loretta Young playing opposite him. He had a hard time getting started; being his father's son wasn't the help you'd think it might be. Now he's on his way!

One of our ace directors returned from England recently, after completing a very successful picture, and announced that he'd never get over one thing that happened to him. In Hollywood he is accustomed to discussing the rewriting of a scene with the author who is working on the picture, and having said author promptly leap to a typewriter and dash off the new version.

In England he was working with a well-known woman writer. They would discuss the changes that had to be made. Then she would get into her car and go to her country home. A week or so later she would return with the new version of the scene, perfectly written. At first the director nearly went mad; eventually he wondered why everybody didn't work that way.

Joan Crawford

Joan Crawford and Franchot Tone are the most recent recruits to the Broadway stage — that is, they are if they can find just the right play, (and it's rumored that they have) and if the studio will let them have leave of absence. It has been no secret that the ambitious Joan wanted to try the stage some day; she once danced on it, and now she wants to act But she wanted to wait till she felt ready for it, and has always insisted that her husband must act with her because she'd lack confidence if he didn't. And as he made quite a reputation for himself before he went to Hollywood, the change won't be hard for him.

ODDS AND ENDS . . . Shirley Temple's father has abandoned the banking business and become an agent for actors . . . Now he'll have to spend his time trying to find somebody who'll be as successful on the screen as Shirley is . . . William Powell will appear without his moustache—at his request—in "The Last of Mrs. Cheyney" . . . First time in 15 years that he's done it . . . If you listen to Jack Benny's radio programs you've heard Kenny Baker . . . You can see as well as hear him in "The King and the Chorus Girl," Carole Lombard's new picture, when it's finished; he'll do two songs.

FLOYD GIBBONS

ADVENTURERS' CLUB

Hello Everybody

"Tropic Nightmare"

By FLOYD GIBBONS

SHIPWRECKED on the African coast! That's the theme of the story that Christian Brodersen of Valley Stream, N. Y., is going to tell us today. And though a tale of shipwreck usually involves a battle with the sea and a grim fight against thirst and starvation, you'll find that none of those dangers bothered Chris. Shipwreck is one thing—but shipwreck on the African coast is another, involving perils far more horrible than anything Old Father Neptune has to offer.

It was on May 25, 1903, that Chris Brodersen signed as a messroom steward on the steamer Lulu Bohlen sailing out of Hamburg, Germany, for the west coast of Africa. After an uneventful trip with stops at Madeira and Palma in the Canary islands, the ship arrived at Monrovia, Liberia, on June 16. There they took on 40 Kroo boys and sailed that same afternoon for Cape Palmas on the Liberian coast. But the ship never reached Cape Palmas—and neither did any of the crew.

On the Rocks, Twenty Miles Off Shore.

At 11:30 that night the Lulu Bohlen ran on the rocks, 20 miles out from shore, off the mouth of the Sanguien river. They didn't know it then, but fires lighted by the treacherous natives had led the ship off its course, and they were in for trouble. The passengers, including about forty women and children, took off in boats manned by most of the crew. The captain, second officer, chief steward and a few others remained behind on the wrecked ship.

Following the captain's instructions, the boats headed for the trading post at River Cess, 60 miles away. They drifted all night close by the steamer and started for River Cess at daybreak. They reached it that evening—to find that the natives had already started looting the Lulu Bohlen and had part of the cargo drawn up on shore near the post.

From that moment on, life was a horrible grisly dream for the passengers and crew of the wrecked ship. The minute the boats were beached they were surrounded by a horde of natives, who snatched the small belongings the passengers had saved from the wreck and vanished with them into the bush. It was only with difficulty that they reached the protection of the trading post stockade, and even then the natives threatened until the trader gave them gin to keep them quiet.

Week of Terror at the Post.

"The natives swarmed around the post day and night," says Chris. "We had to watch our boats incessantly, as they kept trying to smash them to prevent us from getting away. After about two days, some of the crew started back to the ship to get the captain and those who had remained with him. That left only 16 of the crew to protect the women and children. And never in my life shall I forget the week that followed."

Day by day the natives became more restive and more threatening. Again and again the trader gave them more gin to keep them from attacking the post and slaughtering its inhabitants. Anyone who ventured outside the gates now, was stripped of all his belongings and whatever of his clothes took fancy of the blacks. When the gin gave out, the trader was forced to part with other articles of his stock. Before the week had passed he had lost everything he owned. And still the natives threatened and demanded more.

The Boats Were Surrounded by a Horde of Natives.

Things had come to a critical point. The natives, with no prospect of more loot from the trading post, were about to attack and slaughter those inside. Then, in the nick of time, a German steamer, the Kurt Woermann, hove in sight. Inside the post, the trader ran up the distress signal—the company flag, turned upside down and tied in a knot—and the steamer sent a landing party to investigate.

Rest of Crew Found in Sad State.

The Kurt Woermann took passengers and crew of the Lulu Bohlen aboard, and then proceeded down the coast to look for the rest of the crew—those who had set out in one of the boats to bring back the captain and those others who had remained behind on the wrecked ship.

"We sighted them," says Chris, "about 30 miles from the wreck, and the landing party that went after them found them in terrible state. They had barely got outside of the river mouth when their boat was wrecked in a heavy surf. They swam to shore, only to be met by a crowd of natives, who followed them, stole everything they had, including most of their clothes. Some of the natives even bit the plumper ones in the arms and chest until the more civilized blacks drove them off."

Those fellows never had reached the Lulu Bohlen. They had followed the shore line for more than a week, walking first, then staggering and close to exhaustion. For the entire time they had had nothing to eat, for their supplies had been lost when the boat overturned in the surf.

The steamer Kurt Woermann proceeded on down the coast. When it reached the scene of the wreck, they found the Lulu Bohlen, her keel broken in the middle and her decks awash, but no sign of the captain, the mate, chief steward, or any of the rest. The Kurt Woermann moved on down the coast.

At Sinoe, they found the captain, but none of the others. The captain had paid two natives to take them to Sinoe in a canoe. That was the last he had seen of them. "They found the missing men at last in a native kraal," says Chris. "Instead of taking them to Sinoe, the blacks in the canoe had put them on shore at the mercy of other natives. They barely escaped being made into pepper soup. We got back to Germany about the end of July, and a month later British, French and German gunboats shelled the coast villages to punish the natives for wrecking ships—and for cannibalism!"

The Term "Countless"

Despite the fact that the dictionaries define "countless" as, "Incapable of being counted or estimated," general usage admits of a broader definition. Few things upon this earth can not be actually counted by the scientists in their laboratories; hence, the term "countless", in its strict sense, is rarely applicable. We can still refer to "countless" stars in the heavens, and "countless" drops of water in the sea, but the term is employed, and by reputable authorities, in the sense, "that can not be readily counted or estimated." This usage must necessarily be described as "loose," but it has excellent authority.—Literary Digest.

House Centipedes

The house centipede occurs in public buildings and houses, preferring warm, moist situations in basements, greenhouses, bathrooms, etc. It preys on other insects and is regarded by Herrick's "Insects Injurious to the Household" as not highly venomous. The centipedes, especially the larger tropical forms, are reputed to be poisonous to man. Their bite varies in effect, depending on the susceptibility of the person. The same authority concludes that the centipedes occurring in the United States are not to be considered seriously dangerous, though the larger species of the Southwest had probably best be avoided.

Radio and Foghorn Combine to Give Safety to Liners

New Equipment of the Lighthouse Service

WASHINGTON — Up and down the Atlantic coast, from Fowey Rocks light near the tip of Florida to West Quoddy Head light on the northernmost part of the Maine coast, oceanside inhabitants recently heard the mournful wail of foghorns going day and night, in clear weather and foggy, for about a week.

To the layman the foghorn's roar may have seemed like a useless waste of energy and a considerable annoyance, but from the experiment the United States lighthouse service here was able to report the performance of its new distance test equipment. Ocean liners can tell, with this new dual sound and radio equipment, their distance and direction from a given lighthouse or lightship even in the most pea-soup-like fog.

Fog Is Foiled.

The idea behind this aid to marine navigation is the fact that science has found a way to circumvent the often freak apparent directions of sound signals in fogs. In the old days a foghorn blast might appear to come from straight ahead when, in reality, the sound source was many points to the port or starboard.

With the new equipment a ship's master merely has to time the arrival of the foghorn's roar in his pilot house and he can quickly work out his distance from it within the length of his vessel.

Synchronized with the emission of the sound signal is a characteristic radio signal from the lighthouse or lightship. The latter arrives practically instantaneously, while the sound signal takes 5.5 seconds to travel a nautical mile. The captain, by radio, thus knows when the sound starts, and with his stopwatch can time its arrival. The system has an accuracy of 10 per cent at the worst, which sounds like a lot but is really only a tenth of a mile, or 528 feet. Most of the passenger liners on the ocean and many freighters exceed 600 feet in length.

Moreover, with his radio loop aerial, the navigator can tell his direction from the radio beacon and its synchronized sound source.

Lighthouse Revolution.

Radio, in fact, has produced a revolution in lighthouse keeping from the days when it was rightly called the world's loneliest occupation. More and more radio telephone communication is bringing the lighthouses that dot the nation's coast line into quick and close touch with the happenings in more ordinary walks of life. The communication services of the coast guard and navy are links in this chain.

Under the direction of I. L. Gill, signal engineer in charge, the radio beacon service has been worked out with ingenuity that at once brings increased safety to shipping and almost automatic equipment which makes it possible for non-technically trained personnel to maintain the stations.

In the same way the radio direction-finding equipment aboard ships at sea has been so designed that it can be operated by officers on the bridge without the services of a trained radio operator.

Maya Breadnut Urged for South Florida

WASHINGTON. — Breadnut trees, close botanical relatives to the famous breadfruit trees of the South Sea Islands, are suggested as desirable for cultivation in southern Florida, by Dr. O. F. Cook of the United States Department of Agriculture.

The trees recommended by Dr. Cook come from Yucatan, and were known and used by the Maya people who built America's highest native culture centuries before white men came. Southern Florida is climatically very similar to the breadnut's native land, and geologically it is almost identical, being underlain with a porous coral-limestone formation.

The Maya breadnut tree has a large, starchy seed which is gathered for food for human beings, and is relished also by live stock. Roasted or boiled, it tastes very much like the Spanish chestnut.

Even more important, Dr. Cook suggests, may be the use of its leaves as pasture for cattle, which often have a hard time picking up a living off the thin grasses and other ground vegetation in Florida.

It's Harder to Lose Pounds Than It Is to Gain More of Them

Overweight Generally Has But One Cause and That Is Overeating.

"The slim, the irritable, the hungry woman takes on the proportion of one of our minor menaces," says Fannie Hurst in her amusing little book, "No Food With My Meals." Miss Hurst is writing frankly from her own experience in attempting successfully to lose pounds. She admits herself that although she undertook her reduction program under the direction of the doctor, she was not content with the comparatively slow results and cut still further the low calorie diet which the physician gave her.

It is one of the mysteries of life that it is much harder to lose added pounds than it is to gain them. The bathroom scales, which are now so general a part of equipment, enable us to keep a check on weight. It is not so easy for those extra pounds which creep upon us unaware as it was once upon a time. A few days of dieting in time will save the slender figure. Remember, however, that, in general, the addition of a few extra pounds with the years is an asset. They are usually needed to balance those lines which the years write.

Unless there is some glandular deficiency, overweight has but one cause, namely, overeating. The avoidance of more calories than are needed for use by the body for its own processes and for the activity of our lives may usually be a simple matter if there are no between meal sweets and no over-indulgence in bread, butter, other fats and rich desserts with meals. Not complete avoidance! It is only the second helpings that are usually responsible for undue weight gain. Looking out for that pound in time will actually save nine. Just one word of warning, however, don't advertise publicly your diet program.

| Cayenne | Lemon juice |
| ½ teaspoon sugar | Vinegar |

Mix dry ingredients and add yolk of egg. Mix well and add one-half teaspoon vinegar. Add mineral oil gradually, drop by drop at first, then more quickly, beating with egg beater. As mixture thickens thin with lemon juice or vinegar and continue adding oil. When finished mixture should be very stiff. Keep covered in the ice box.

Bunyan Created Lakes

Elk and Torch lakes, the beautiful finger lakes that stretch parallel for miles along the shore of Lake Michigan near Elk Rapids, date back to the days of Paul Bunyan, according to the old lumberjacks.

Lake Michigan, they say, was scooped out by the mighty Paul, to be used as a log pond. Instead of skidding the logs into a stream and floating them down to his pond Paul would hitch onto a section of land and drag it over to the lake, log off the timber, and then haul the section back.

One day Paul hooked onto a particularly heavy timbered section near the Boardman and started Babe, the blue ox, out to haul it over to the lake. There had been a heavy rain, the ground was greasy, and Babe's feet slipped.

Torch and Elk lakes remain, an eternal testimonial to the blue ox and the time his feet slipped.—Detroit Free Press.

Here's Simple Way to Ease a Cold

Two Quick-Acting, Quick-Dissolving Bayer Aspirin Tablets with a Glass of Water

The modern way to ease a cold is this: Two Bayer Aspirin tablets the moment you feel a cold coming on. Then repeat, if necessary, according to instructions in the box.

At the same time, if you have a sore throat, crush and dissolve three BAYER tablets in one-third glass of water. And gargle with this mixture twice.

The Bayer Aspirin you take internally will act to combat fever and the pains which usually accompany colds. The gargle will act as a medicinal gargle to provide almost instant relief from rawness and pain. It is really marvelous; for it acts like a local anesthetic on the irritated membrane of your throat.

Try this way. Your doctor, we know, will endorse it. For it is a quick, effective means of combating a cold. Ask for Bayer Aspirin by the full name at your druggist's — not for "aspirin" alone.

World's Youngest Mayor Guest of LaGuardia and New York

Municipal budgets and such were discussed by the mayor of the world's largest city and world's youngest mayor when Mayor LaGuardia of New York played host to 17-year-old Mayor Daniel Kampan of Boys Town recently. Left to right above are LaGuardia, Kampan and Father Flanagan, founder and director of Boys Town.

THE world's youngest mayor visited New York recently as official guest of the mayor of the world's largest city—and they talked about budgets!

Danny Kampan, Mayor of Boys Town, Nebr., is only 17 and the youngest mayor of a real city in the world. As mayor of New York, Fiorello LaGuardia controls the largest municipal budget in the world.

After being locked in private conference in LaGuardia's office for some fifteen minutes, the mayor of New York admitted newspapermen and photographers:

"Mayor Kampan and I have exchanged credentials" LaGuardia said. "We've decided this job of being mayor isn't all it's cracked up to be!"

"You said it!" chimed in the youthful Kampan.

Going to New York to take part in a national radio broadcast, the Mayor of Boys Town and Father Flanagan, founder and director of the nationally famous home for homeless boys there were accorded all the courtesies and honors extended by the metropolis only to world celebrities. They were met at the train by Mayor LaGuardia's official motor cavalcade with smartly uniformed motorcycle officers flanking all sides. With screaming sirens clearing their way through the heavy New York traffic, they were whisked to the city hall for the big public reception.

While the two mayors posed for a battery of photographers. Father Flanagan stood in the background smiling gently, his eyes serious and kindly. He founded Boys Town, ten miles west of Omaha in 1917. Since then 4,466 homeless boys of all races, color and creeds—from the 48 states of the union have been made good citizens there.

Beseiged by reporters for a history of his famous home he said: "No boy is a really bad boy. If you take him off the streets you can stem the tide of Crime. No one wants to be a criminal. It's only the lack of opportunity that makes boys criminals."

Breathless before the honors and recognition extended his homeless boys by the great American metropolis Father Flanagan told newspapermen how Boys Town began 19 years ago with five boys, how today present Boys Town with its 360 acres of fine farm land and modern buildings was his dream come true. With pride he showed reporters a recent letter written him by J. Edgar Hoover, head of the nation's G-Men. Hoover wrote: "If Boys Town were just financially able to care for all the boys that need its help, crime would be dealt one of the most effective and crushing blows I can imagine."

While in New York, young Kampan was offered an opportunity to attend an eastern preparatory school, a scholarship in an eastern college and a career. He turned them down with thanks, and a smile:

"Thank you very much" he said "but I think I'll go [illegible]

Letter of Thanks From Ordahl's

Members of the Golden Valley Congregation and Ladies' Aid.

Dear friends:

To each one of you we wish to express our sincere gratitude for the very substantial gift sent to us at Christmas time. Our hearts were filled with emotion as we read the letter explaining the gift. Our thoughts went back to the years when that territory was opened for homesteading. There were hardships and difficulties both for you and your pastor, but we all hoped for better days and struggled cheerfully on.

As your former pastor, I wish to leave with you this scripture passage as a New Year benediction. "But the God of all grace, who hath called us unto his eternal glory by Christ Jesus, after that ye have suffered awhile, make you perfect, establish, strengthen, settle you." 1 Peter 5:10.

To all our friends of Holt and vicinity, we wish a Blessed New Year.

The Sam Lorentson family have all been on the sick list.

Open Drive On Death Toll

A statewide drive, in co-operation with the sheriffs and county attorneys of Minnesota's 87 counties, was launched this week by the Minnesota Highway department to reduce the toll of human life on the highways and to drive the drunken driver off the public roads.

Instructions for the drive were issued to all patrolmen of the Minnesota Highway patrol by John P. Arnoldy, chief patrol officer. At the same time, Chief Arnoldy, in his biennial report to N. W. Elsberg, state commissioner of highways, disclosed that the enlarged highway patrol had traveled a million more miles in 1936 than in 1935, put in 90,000 more patrol hours, and performed more than 400,000 official acts in the interest of law enforcement and accident prevention.

Minnesota sheriffs and county attorneys, at their recent state conventions, have been consulted and have agreed to full co-operation in the statewide campaign, Chief Arnoldy said.

In the past State Highway Patrolmen have customarily placed careless driving charges against motor vehicle operators under the influence of liquor. Hereafter, under new instructions in all such cases, patrolmen are ordered to consult with the county attorney whenever a driver is apprehended under influence of liquor, and the decision will be left to that county attorney as to whether the charge shall be careless driving or drunken driving, carrying a much more severe penalty.

"The great slaughter of human lives on our highways must be stopped. You have the means, and with the assistance of the county attorney and sheriff, fatalities and accidents can be reduced, and it is your duty to do so." Mr. Arnoldy said in his instruction bulletin.

9th Dist. F-L Convention

Sam Hauge of Bagley and John Flint of Underwood Named To State Central Committee

George Hagen of Crookston, former secretary of the 9th District Farmer-Labor Association was named Chairman at their convention at Mahnomen Saturday January 9th. Sam Hauge of Bagley and John Flint of Fergus Falls were elected as members of the State Central Committee to take the place of Verner Nelson, who declined reelection, and Senator Harry Bridgeman. Verner Nelson was elected Secretary of the 9th District organization.

The convention was called to order by John Flint, who has served as Chairman for the past year. He outlined the purpose of the convention after which a resolutions committee was named. After the election of the officers of the convention the members of the State Central Committee were elected, there being no contest the selections were unanimous.

Leonard Westberg of this county Carl Berg of Polk, Otto Rehm of Pennington, Sgerman of Ottertail and Gullickson of Beltrami were the members of the resolutions committee for the Mahnomen convention.

State Convention Committeemen were selected as follows:

Rules Committee—
R. M. Aalbu, of Pennington
A. A. Matt, of Polk.
Credentials Committee—
F. L. Clayton, Beltrami
Elmer Johnson, Ottertail.
Resolutions Committee—
Emil Morberg, Marshall
Hans Skorstad, Clay.
Constitution and law—
Mr. Skeim, Clay
L. J. Weeks, Becker.
Organization—
A. Carlson, Red Lake
James Steck, Mahnomen.
Legislative—
Mr. Hastad, Norman
A. M. Landby, Roseau.

Among the resolutions adopted was one expressing sympathy to Governor Elmer A. Benson whose mother recently passed away, and another resolution expressing approval of the program and principles outlined in Governor Benson's address to the Minnesota law makers.

The next convention will be held at Plummer. This convention will likely be held early in 1938 to endorse a candidate for Congress. R. T. Buckler, who was elected for a second term last fall may be the candidate of the party in the next campaign since he has a 100 per cent record.

The will of S. H. Sonsen, Winona attorney and a member of the State College Board, bequeathed $10,000 to needy students attending various state teachers colleges in Minnesota. The Board will decide who are to be the recipients of aid on recomendations of the normal college presidents. Mr. Sonson died on December 15.

And How Was It Done

The readers of the "NEWS" are naturally interested in knowing how-come that the Holt Weekly News could become the official newspaper of Marshall County for the first time in its 26 years of service to the community.

Everyone knows that Mr. Hanson has been very ill for the past year and the work has been dnoe by Mrs. Hanson. And Mr. Hanson's illness is such that he will have to stay away from the print shop until the lead poisoning has been eliminated from his system.

So the publishers were seriously considering closing shop, or finding some way in which they might help themselves, because they had been working under a handicap.

It was then that the publisher of the Marshall Count Star at Warren and the Northern Minnesota Leader at Roseau came along. The Star, at Warren, is not yet a legal newspaper and the publisher was very desirous of bidding on the County printing at that was one thing that many people of Marshall County had looked forward to.

An agreement was reached whereby Mr. H. O. Hanson leased the "NEWS" to us. That proved a real surprise to the competing bidders when the bids for County printing were opened Thursday January 7th.

The bids of the News were: publishing of Commissioners Proceedings and legal notices, 41 cents per folio for the first insertion and 20 cents per folio for each additional insertion; for one publication of the County financial statement our bid was 45 cents per folio while the publication of the delinquent tax list was 12 cents per description. Our bid for the second publication of the financial statement in the Marshall County Star was 45 cents per folio. Commissioners proceedings and delinquent tax list to be published in the Marshall County Star also.

The competing bid was entered by the Warren Sheaf and was as follows: 70 cents per folio for publishing of the Commissioners Proceedings and legal notices and 40 cents per folio for each additional insertion; 70 cents per folio for publication of the County financial statement and 15 cents per description for the deliquent tax list. The Newfolden Clarion bid 75 cents per folio (straight) for the second publication of the financial statement.

So the result is a saving to the taxpayers of Marshall County of almost 50% on the printing bill, and Mr. and Mrs. Hanson will fare better as a result; the citizens of Holt feeling secure that their newspapr will continue and last but not least, the new publisher feels very very good because it means some very needed revenue and assures the Farmer-Laborites of Marshall County that the Marshall County Star is firmly established.

From time to time we will be here to meet with, and get better acquainted with, the people of the community. We hope that the people of the community will respond with their subscriptions and support. We feel certain Mrs. Hanson, as Editor and Business Manager merits your confidence and "good will".

Verner Nelson, Publisher.

Jacob Nelson is ill and confined to his bed.

Holt Pioneer Called

Dr. Halvor Holte, 79, pioneer physician and civic leader of Crookston, died January 9th at a hospital there, from pneumonia Funeral services were held January 13 in the English Lutheran church.

Born at Stavanger, Norway, July 11, 1857, Dr. Holte came to America with his parents when he was 15 years old. The family settled on a homestead in Fillmore county where Dr. Holte lived several years. Later he worked in northwestern Minnesota. He became the first homesteader at Holt, which place was named for him.

Later he attended Augsburg seminary in St. Paul, St. Olaf's college at Northfield and the University of Minnesota where he received his degree in medicine.

Three Cheers For Boy Scouts

The Boy Scout bean feed held last Saturday evening at the Lutheran church was a success.

The boys worked diligently from 5:30 in the morning until 11 that night in a cooperative spirit that could compete with any adult group and put them to shame.

The boys kept the bean pot fires going all day, had hard luck when one pot got to hot and burnt the beans in it, but still served the supper at six o'clock smiling and courteous.

After they were through serving they washed dishes, the floor, and cleaned up in fine shape.

The proceeds were about $17.

Minnesota Took The Lead

Facts for Farmers, published in Washington, D. C., in an article in the January issue recognizes the Minnesota Farmer Labor Party under the leadership of the late Governor Olson as the forerunner in America for homestead tax exemption laws. Since the campaign for exemption of taxes on homesteads, Facts for Farmers points out, six states have already passed homestead exemptton laws and many others haee such laws now nnder consideration.

Liberals Take Over Control

Liberals for the first time in the history of Minnesota on January 5 took over control of our state government. With Governor Elmer A. Benson, Attorney General William S. Ervin, and State Treasurer C. A. Halverson, all Farmer-Laborites, in office, control of the State Executive Council will rest with liberals. The other two members of the Council are Secretary of State Mike Holm and State Auditor Stafford King.

The new House has been organized by Liberals with Representative Harold H. Barker of Elbo Lake as speaker. Conservatives, however; remain in control of the Senate, by virtue of the fact that there were no elections to the Senate on November 3.

The House is expected to go along with Governor Benson in enacting a real constructive liberal program. Just how far the reactionary-controlled Senate will go is a matter for speculation. In view of the fact, however, that the Republican spokes men in the last election declared themselves in favor of liberal legislation and also because the overwhelming vote for the liberal candidates constitutes a mandate from the people, reactionary senators are expected to place fewer obstacles in the path of such a progran than formerly.

Control of the Railroad and Warehouse Commission also will rest with the liberals with all three members, Commissioners Charles R. Munn, Harold E. Atwood and Hjalmer Peterson, all Farmer-Laborites.

One of the Best Things in Life Is Moral Victory

To demand victory without an antagonist is to demand something with no meaning . . . If you take all the evil out of the world you will remove the possibility of the best thing in life. That does not mean that evil is good. What one means by calling a thing good is that the spirit rests permanently content with it for its own sake.

Evil is precisely that with which no spirit can rest content; and yet it is the condition, not the accidental but the essential condition, of what is in and for itself the best thing in life, namely, moral victory.—Archbishop Temple.

Simple, Practical Frocks

WHERE, oh where is the feminine wardrobe that through the addition of just these three simple, wearable frocks? Surely like the Model T, it would be hard to find. And the thrilling thing — the important feature — is that these frocks are planned and patterned exclusively for the modern woman who sews—for you, a member of The Sewing Circle.

Pattern 1914 is a house dress with a future. It is young and practical. The new notched collar, ending as it does in twin scallops below the yoke line, gives the waist front balance and brightness. The bodice is slightly fulled to make this a comfortable style to work in as well as one that is attractive to look at. The skirt is slim lined and simple—as you would have it. Use dimity, dotted swiss or gingham for this number. Designed for sizes: 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44, 46 and 48. Size 36 requires 3⅞ yards of 35 inch material.

Pattern 1989 is the polite young model caught with its back this way, perhaps the better to show off the beautiful shoulders and chicest - of - chic descending lines. You'll run-up this frock in short order but you'll wear it endlessly and with that happy confidence which only a style with distinction can give. Make it of raspberry wool crepe and trim the collar, cuffs and hem with royal blue. Pattern 1989 comes in sizes 14, 16, 18 and 20 (32 to 42 bust). Size 16 requires 3 yards of 54 inch material with 5 yards of braid for trimming.

Pattern 1206 is a most attractive newcomer to the blouse 'n' skirt category. An alliance of this sort beings glamour and romance to the gay wearer. Gold or silver metallic cloth, or, perhaps shimmering satin for the blouse with a skirt of velvet will make a million dollar outfit. Make it yours in a couple of hours. It is available in sizes 14, 16, 18 and 20 (32 to 42 bust). Size 16 requires 2⅛ yards of 39 inch material for the blouse and 2⅛ yards for the skirt. The blouse with long sleeves requires 2⅜ yards 39 inches wide.

A detailed sewing chart accompanies each pattern to guide you every step of the way.

The Road of Truth

There may exist different conceptions of beauty; everyone has his own personal opinion, but there can be no question about the truth of the feeling of beauty. That is real and palpable. There can be no two truths, and from this I recognized that there is only one road that leads to the attainment of beauty. That road is Truth. — Feodor Chaliapin, in "Man and Mask."

Personal Chats

Elmer Benson has now been inaugurated Governor of our State. People in all walks of life seem to have a great deal of confidence in him. And it is our belief that he merits confidence. Here is a man that has strong convictions regarding what is right and what is wrong, and his sympathies are with those who feed and clothe and build the homes for the Nation.

Yes, Benson's sympathies are definitely on the side of the producing class. And he is a worker himself; there are few idle moments during his waking hours. There are things in his life that shows, very vividly, the influence of a MOTHER capable of laying the foundation for character in her children.

But this sincere man needs friends NOW more than he needed friends on election day. Not only does the opposition plan how to STOP this sincere and honest man but ther are men within his own party, who will leave no stones unturned to destroy him, or force him to permit them their evil practices.

We serve this warning because we know undercurrents that exist. And the greatest danger to our dear Governor is right from within his own party.

The Farmer-Labor party is no different than any other political party in that designing persons fasten themselves to the party in power, like leeches, and anyone who dares attempt to stop their nefarious practices are villified and no opportunity is missed to destroy those who stand in their way.

And that brings to our minds that every person who votes the Republican ticket is not dishonest, even though some dark deeds and terrible steals have been perpetrated by Republican officials.

The Tea Pot Dome Scandal was not approved of by the rank and file of the Republicans. But the rank and file permitted persons with ulterior designs to get control of their party and graft and corruption permeated the entire structure of their party to the extent that it was used by racketeers of every description. And the people have lost faith in that party because of that.

And the sincere people within the Farmer-Labor movement must assert themselves and keep the same type of designing persons from gaining control of their party. And they should inform themselves before being mislead regarding leaders within their movement. They should not allow anyone to lead them to become prejudiced against people who work conscientiously for the common good.

Recently it was our displeasure to listen to a person attempting to prejudice Farmer-Laborites against one of the best and most fearless leaders in the entire Farmer-Labor movement. Yes an attempt is being made to discredit Mrs. Marion LeSeuer and force her off the State Central Committee.

And some of the same tactics are being used in an effort to discredit Mrs. Selma Seestrom, who together with Mrs. LeSeuer comprise the members of the State Central Committee from Minneapolis, or 5th district.

These two Ladies are capable but the racketeers can not boss them, hence the campaign of vilification, right from within our own party.

And this gentry is not satisfied with spreading lies and attempting to discredit other State Central Committeemen who have dared to take measures against persons with ulterior motives.

Honest people often get tired of being villefied and they quit in disgust. But the racketeers never quit. They seem endowed with unlimited gall, and they seem to be related to the breed that has nine lives.

The name a party bears means nothing. But what principles does it embrace and how does it serve the COMMON PEOPLE? That is very important.

When Christ said, "BY THEIR FRUITS YE SHALL KNOW THEM" He extolled a principle that never fails, if thoroughly understood.

And when we recite these facts we do not refer to people in this section of the State. The Cities are the dens of inequity, now, as has been the case all the way down through the ages.

That is not saying that there are undeserving people, to a greater or lesser degree, in rural sections as well as in the Metropolitan areas. But the great wrongs practised against the people, in the name of protection of Government, usually has its inception in Metropolitan centers.

The writer always believed in the principles extolled by the Farmer-Labor party and it has been our pleasure to have faith in the greater portion of the people and faith in the sincerity of people who have been so highly honored as to be the candidates to carry the banner of the Farmer-Labor party to VICTORY.

But we have been disillusioned. We need to have great faith in Hjalmar Petersen who just relinquished his position as Governor and became Railroad and Warehouse Commissioner. We helped to make him a candidate for that post and we were not a little inclined, at that time, to feel that he should have been the candidate for Governor.

Yes, we were not a little bit hurt when Elmer Benson was made United States Senator, a fact that we feel need of begging humble forgiveness of Mr. Benson. And we honor the memory of Floyd B. Olson for making him Senator and projecting Elmer Benson as Candidate for Governor.

For Floyd B. Olson had embarked on a definite plan of action, and he wanted men of the Benson type to control the party and extend and increase the influence of the great movement he had brought into office and make it a great force in the building of a NEW world that would give the message a greater and happier life.

And we come back to peg away at Hjalmar Petersen again. We feel we have sufficient reason to be sorry of that we helped to make him a candidate for Railroad and Warehouse Commissioner, and it is not because he did not appoint the writer in place of Harold Atwood to fill the vacancy left by Knute Wefald.

There were some sixty candidates for the position of Railroad and Warehouse Commissioner, and the only one objected to by the Executive Committee of the Farmer-Labor Association was Harold Atwood.

Then why did Hjalmar Petersen appoint Atwood? Bill Sermon of Duluth would have been pleased to have had the appointment, but perhaps he was too honorable and refused to sign on the dotted line and betray the principles of his party and his own conscience?

Then too, how about Herman Aufterheide? Was Herman too honorable? Those who have an inkling of the circumstances can truly feel that Mr. Aufterheide is certainly a man of sterling principles.

And having unburdened ourselves to the extent we have we wonder if we have said enough to warrant an investigation of the Atwood appointment by our state convention? Or maybe inquiry should be made as to who it was that interviewed at least two candidates for the Railroad and Warehouse Commission vacancy, and what was the terms on which appointment could be had?

And as a tip we suggest that the information on the Atwood appointment that is contained in the files of the Farmer-Labor Association be scanned, and that Bill Sermon of Duluth be called on to testify, as well as Herman Aufterheide.

We are determined that the reported and partly admitted wrongs against the State of Minnesota and the Farmer-Labor movement shall not go unchallenged.

That is one reason we refused to a candidate for re-election as a member of the State Central Committee of the Farmer-Labor Association.

From the outside we can be of greater service in really finding out if the ugly athmosphere can not be clarified.

The fight on members of the State Central Committee by State employees looks as though sinister motives impelled certain unscrupulous persons to attempt to get control of the Farmer-Labor Association and the Minnesota Leader and bludgeon Governor Elmer Benson into submission and force him to give them a free hand.

We sound a ringing warning. It is our firm conviction that the "CALL TO COLORS" must be sounded and our movement protected from destruction. With Elmer Benson as Governor our movement has a great opportunity for service, if we give the proper protection.

Legislative Recommendations

Funds Situation and U. S. Aid

Minnesota vitally needs legislation which will put the Department of Highways on a pay-as-you-go basis. This can be accomplished either by eliminating road construction or by increasing current revenues. Additional revenues are needed to match regular federal aid, meet state obligations on other federal funds, and provide for expenditure of state funds on roads where no assistance is available from the national government.

There will be $5,537,000 in various federal highway funds available for Minnesota in 1937 and a similar amount in 1938. On the basis of present income, the Highway Department cannot obtain this money for the state.

Approximately the same situation faced the 1935 session of the Minnesota Legislature. After much deliberation, the Legislature at that time authorized the sale of state bonds to finance federal aid, rather than increasing current revenues of the Highway Department. Bond charges now take more than one-fourth of the current income of the Highway Department every year. It is evident that a policy of continued borrowing through bond issues without increasing the regular sources of department income is undesirable.

Mileage Increased 65 Per Cent

The 1933 Legislature added 4,500 miles of county roads to the state trunk highway system, an increase of 65 per cent in mileage. At the same time motor vehicle license fees were reduced and the gasoline tax was kept unchanged. No prmanent means of financing the improvement and maintenance of the enlarged trunk system has since been provided.

The pubic and the Legislature must soon choose between the abandonment of a normal highway improvement program or the adoption of a schedule of motor vehicle and motor vehicle taxes high enough to meet the cost of such a program.

Complete details of the financial problems of the Highway Department will presented to the Legislative committees whose province it is to consider the situation. We believe that the interests of motorists using our highways and of the public at large will be served best by making a substantial increase in current revenues for the trunk highway system. The means by which such an increase should be provided—whether by motor vehicle registration fees or gasoline taxes or both—is a matter for legislative determination. Motorists in Minnesota pay a lower average total annual tax than those of almost any other state.

Safety a Major Factor

An important factor to be considered in future highway improvements is that of traffic safety. There is a public demand for safer roads, including separated traffic lanes, separated crossings, greater sight distances on curves and hills, widening and straightening of older highways, by-passing of towns and cities and modernization of bridges. Such work is expensive and cannot be done without adequate finances.

Employment

The factor of the public employment that is provided by construction of useful highway projects also is one that continues to merit attention and consideration.

Trunk System Additions

There have been suggestions that further additions be made to the mileage of the trunk highway system. It is true that certain logical additions to the trunk system were not included in the 1933 expansion. However, the danger is great that if these should be added in 1937, the door will be opened to demands for inclusion of a large mileage of new routes which the Highway Department will not be financially able to maintain. Unwise additions also would invite litigation which might jeopardize the present status of the trunk system. Therefore no proposals for new additions at this time should be granted without the most serious consideration.

Delays in Reciept of Motor Vehicle License Fees

Serious financial embarrassment is caused the Highway Department in those years when the Legislature extends the time limit for payment of motor vehicle license fees. To enable the Dpartment to meet its obligations up to the deferred date established for license payments, it is recommended that the Legislature authorize the Department of Highways to anticipate such delayed license fee receipts by borrowing from available state funds.

Gas Tax Refunds

Refunds of the state gasoline tax have risen to such large sums that it would seem wise to strengthen legislation covering this subject to the end that abuse of the refund privilege be effectually guarded against It is common experience that when the law provides means for obtaining refunds of tax payments, such as are offered in our gas tax laws, there is a natural tendency for the refunds to grow until they form a much larger proportion of the total collections than was ever comtemplated in the original statutes.

Untaxed Motor Vehicle Fuels

Improvements in internal combustion motors are making it possible for more and more motor vehicles to use fuels other than gasoline. Such fuels are not subject to the Minnesota Gasoline Tax. It is obviously unjust to tax the gasoline used in other motor vehicles transporting commodities on the public highways. Remedial legislation is needed.

Driver's License Division

The 1933 Legislature enacted a Driver's License Law and placed its administration under the Commissioner of Highways. No adequate provision has been made for financing the operation of this act on a permanent basis. Unless such provision is made, an effective administration cannot be provided in the future.

Trailer Safety Provisions

The increasing use of trailers drawn by passenger automobiles for carrying or housing passengers calls for consideration.

The present law provides that such trailers having two or more wheels and having a capacity in excess of 1,000 pounds pay a license fee on the same basis as an automobile. The reciprocity agreements which prevail between Minnesota and the several States is observed the same as with automobiles.

No provisions are set up for the safe operation of these trailers. In the interest of public safety, minimum standards of construction, brakes, clearance lights, rear vision and hitches or coupling should be imposed.

Respectfully submitted,
N. W. ELSBERG.

Communication

Jan. 6, 1937.
Argyle, Minn.

Marshall Co. Star
Dear Editor:

On December 28, last, the Bigwoods Farmers Union held its annual meeting and transacted its usual business. But of more than ordinary importance was a letter from Oscar Christenson of Moorhead, Minnesota, Secretary of the Cooperative Union Activities which was read at the meeting. I will quote in part.

"Your state organization has decided after careful consideration by ballot and by special convention to effect a merger with the Farmers Educational and Cooperative Union of America, Minnesota Division not later than May 15."

This should be good news to members of both organizations because it will bring the strength of both into one. Although both have been run by Farmers looking to the Farmers Welfare. There is no doubt they can make more headway united, besides doing away with overlapping Educational work. This will save some in costs also.

The meeting also voted to change Thursday meeting date to the second Friday in the month. This was done to avoid conflicting dates. Our next meeting will be Feb. 12.

Respectfully yours,
Arnold Dahlin, Sec.

COMMUNICATION

Buffalo, Minn.
Jan. 1, 1937.

Dear friend:

Since I am retiring from the office of Secretary-Treasurer of the Cooperative Union Activities, I wish to thank you for the fine cooperation and encouragement that you have given thru the years. I cannot tell you how highly I value making your acquaintance, and having your cooperation during my tenure of office.

But in this Farmers Union movement we must not stop with pleasant personal experiences. We must keep the movement and objectives in mind. Our one objective is to develop an economic and social order that will permit us to enjoy the abundant material and spiritual resources evident on every hand.

We have made a beginning but we are still far from the goal. Shali we dedicate 1937 to the study of the cooperative movement? It is this system of business that will do away with exploitation, and hence bring a new economic order. In the cooperative system of production and distribution it will not be necessary to devote all ones time to manual labors. There will be time for mental and intellectual effort, and this will lead to a better social order as well. Since all of this is true, should we not get busy in 1937?

May the Farmers Union prosper in 1937? We are mindful of the service its institutions and its leaders have given us. Its numerous local elevators and oil companies, as well as terminal institutions have saved us money. But their leadership has also broadened our mental vision. For example, there is the Farmers Union Live Stock Commission.

Those of us who have made it a habit to consign our stock there have the satisfaction of knowing that the returns have been all that the market afforded. The Manager, Mr. Egley, has spent his spare evenings talking the cooperative movement in many different communities. It would be interesting to know how many cooperative oil stations and Farmers Union locals have followed where Mr. Egley has worked his educational program. Let us farmers remember the Farmers Union Livestock Commission Co. when we ship our hogs, calves, cattle and sheep.

But in 1937 we are also going to build a lot of Farmers Union locals. In these locals we are going to discuss the Farmers Union Cooperative program. For some years there has been friction because there were two state educational organizations. This condition has been remedied by an amalgamation agreement by which we hope the two organizations will become one. I assure you that in this move we are going to make the acquaintance of many fine, loyal and progressive people.

Shall we dare hope to see the day when all of our needs will be supplied cooperatively thru Farmers Union organizations? If that is to be so we shall have to help build many more Farmers Union activities. But in building new ones let us not forget to be loyal to the ones already established. Let us briefly enumerate a few.

THE FARMERS UNION COOPERATIVE EDUCATION SERVICE. Really, this is the most important of all our institutions. It addresses itself to the young especially. In 1937 this constitution will major among the Juniors in the subject: "The Cooperative Movement, Yours and Mine." It is too much to ask that every Junior and Leader in Minnesota will get a copy of this booklet and master its contents?

THE FARMERS UNNION TERMINAL ASSOCIATION, THE FARMERS UNION LIVE STOCK COMMISSION, So. St. Paul, Minnesota and West Fargo, N. D., THE FARMERS UNION CENTRAL EXCHANGE, constitute the business trinity of the Farmers Union in the Northwest. Each is a body independent of the other but no history of the cooperative movement in the Northwest will be complete unless it relates the interactivity of the three.

Space does not permit me to dwell any longer on our program, but let us work and develop it by loyalty and patronage.

Let me close with a final word of appreciation to the loyal Juniors and Leaders in Minnesota. That was one feature of my work that I shall remember with pleasure as long as I live. If in the process of amalgamating with the Minnesota Division we shall be blessed with able leadership in the Junior field, we shall have a bright future before us. The signs are that the Juniors are going to fare best of all in the united organization.

Till we meet again, Godspeed and good luck, as well as a happy New Year!

Fraternally yours,
J. Edward Anderson.

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT SPENT $55,000,000 IN STATE SINCE 1933

The far-flung emergency conservation work program sponsored by the federal government has resulted in the expenditure of more than $55,000,000 in Minnesota alone since the spring of 7933, according to the third biennial report of the state Deuartment of Conservation, now in preparation.

Minnesota, although ranking but eighteenth in population, on September 1, 1936, held seventh place in expenditure of federal funds for conservation purposes, the report states.

On that date 45,000 enrollees and 5,000 supervisory and technical employees had secured employment in national forest, state forest, state park, soil conservation service, and United States biological survey CCC camps.

It is estimated that $27,000,000 of the total federal expenditures was devoted to improvements directly under the supervision of the state Department of Conservation.

The report recommends to the Legislature the adoption of a merit system governing all employees of the department.

"The past two years have witnessed greater strides in the advancement of the cause of constructive conservation along all lines than any similar period in the state's history," the report states. "The work actually accomplished has advanced by many decades the state's program for the intensive management of its conservation and restoration needs and has furnished a basis on which future long time requirements may be planned.

ADEQUATE FOOD SUPPLY FOR GAME BIRDS AVAILABLE

With exception of scattered areas in the western and southwestern parts of th state plenty of natural food for game birds is still available, according to Frank Blair, state superintendent of game propagation.

Winter conditions so far are classed as "normal" in about 75 per cent of the state. Only eight game wardens have asked for grain for artificial feeding, according to Mr. Blair. The Division of Game and Fish is discouraging artificial feeding of birds unless absolutely necessary.

"In cooperation with farmers we have planted approximately 8,000 acres of black amber cane in 63 counties south of a line drawn through Wilkin, Ottertail, Wadena, Cass, Crow Wing, Aitkin, and Carlton counties," Mr. Blair states.

"Nearly 700 acres of buckwheat and millet have been planted in 16 counties in the northwestern part of the state. The presence of this additional natural food will undoubtedly be of greater benefit for our upland game birds."

Mr. Blair emphasized that pheasants are extremely hardy and seldom require artificial feeding. He warnd that highways should not be used for artificial feeding. Highway feeding, in addition to the danger from traffic, gives poachers a good opportunity for hunting by car.

Hugh drove his car into the country, drove for miles on unfamiliar roads. Finally he drew up at a maple beside a field and sat there, thinking. People passing in cars on their way to church, nudged each other at the sight of the young man hunched over his wheel, a look of stupor on his face. They tittered and exchanged glances.

Finally he started the engine and drove toward town. He turned into his mother's driveway at half-past twelve. Kezia waved to him and came running down the steps. "Dorrie has called twice. She said to ring her up if you came over

He looked past her with lustreless eyes. "All right," he said thickly.

Carefully he backed the car down the drive, and then circled the boulevard three times before he could force himself to go down his own street.

Dorrie met him at the door. Her eyelids were red with recent weeping, and the sight twanged a responsive chord of pity in him.

"Hugh," she said bravely. Then choked and paused. "Hugh, I've seen Cun. I've told him it was all over between us."

He stood, frozen as a statue, his sombre eyes burning into hers.

"I know now that you're the only one I care for—the only one. The other was——"

"An interlude?"

"No—a madness. Can't you forgive me?"

She seized his hand. "Listen, Hugh—you must believe me—and don't look at me like that—so cold and hard! I've been very wicked . . . I'm sorry for the things I've said and done. But you'll have nothing to complain of now—nothing! Please say you will!"

Tears began to roll down her cheeks. "I'm so unhappy and miserable. . . ."

The habit of the heart is strong. He took a step forward. A compulsion greater than he, an involuntary movement, and his arms closed around her, closed around her in desperate yearning.

CHAPTER VIII

After the interview between Ellen Pendleton's parents and Jerry Purdue, they handed down the ultimatum that they would not sanction an engagement yet. Let things work out. There was no hurry.

In July there was a perceptible shrinkage in Jerry's devotion. He did not telephone quite so often. He had vague excuses for not coming since Tuesday. Lizzie's quick eyes noted the change almost as soon as Ellen, and used it as a small whip to lash her.

"Not coming this afternoon—Saturday? I thought he had the afternoon off. Nor tonight? . . . He has to see a man on business? . . . A good bit of that lately! . . .

When Lizzie learned that Jerry had been seen at the country club as the escort of Kezia Marsh, she was triumphant. She could scarcely wait to tell Ellen.

Jerry took some of the sting out of this information by saying to Ellen that night: "I want to be perfectly frank with you—I've been seeing something of Kezia lately."

Her heart knocked a little, but she managed to smile. "Kezia—yes?"

He watched her closely. "I took her out to the dance the other night."

"She's very—attractive."

"Oh, attractive enough, but a little spoiled. She amuses me. It occurred to me that since your parents are so set against an engagement, it would be well for us to go around with others occasionally."

"Do you think that would help matters with them?"

"At least it wouldn't cause so much talk. No one would be sure that we were engaged—and that would please your parents."

Jerry had put the top of his little car down and they were spinning past an endless whirligig of meadows and woods yielding to the blur of twilight. She felt a bit sick that he would think of such a procedure. It was disenchanting to know that he could find pleasure elsewhere for an evening.

"You're not saying anything. What do you think of it?" urged Jerry.

She spoke in a low tone. "Isn't it it your wish and desire that counts?" She paused. "But if your only object is to please Father and Mother—you won't do it that way. Mother was beginning to like you—I could see it."

Jerry made a dissenting sound. His dark face was turned in sullen profile as he brooded. "They get me down when I come to see you. I'm not good enough for a son-in-law!"

"Mind if I ask you a question?"

"Ask away."

"Did you go to see Kezia more than once? Sometimes I have a feeling that Kezia is not really friendly toward me—that she would be glad to show you off as a conquest she had made."

He laughed. "Don't I know it? She's a flighty wench—half a dozen men on the hook."

"And you're sure of me?" she asked with a dubious smile.

"Sweetheart, you're worth a dozen Kezias," he said with glib impetuosity. "You know I think that."

A great many things made Fluvanna unsettled and discomforted, yet not one fact which she could put her finger on and say, "this is the reason." Michael, Margery's son, had ear trouble with a threatened mastoid, and Fluvanna's eager sympathy drained her strength away through the weeks of illness.

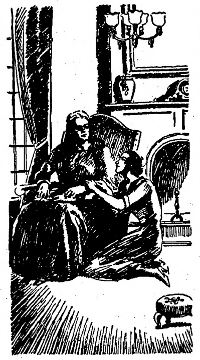
And what had become of Ellen? So busy and happy that she never had time to drop in? She called Lizzie on the telephone to invite her and Ellen for lunch on Wednesday, but Lizzie was curt in her refusal. Both she and Ellen had engagements for Wednesday. Fluvanna flushed at her short tone.

Perhaps she was a selfish mother, but she wished that Kezia would be more companionable, give her more of her confidence.

One Monday night she said to her firmly, "Kezia, I must know where you are going."

Kezia frowned nervously as she stood with the screen door half open. "Running over to Emmy's. Someone will bring me home."

Fluvanna rose from her chair by the reading lamp. She watched Kezia's light slim figure grow blurred in the darkness of the long front walk. She was only a bobbing shadow on the street, walking slowly now. Then as she watched her, Kezia's footsteps quickened a little. She turned toward the curb where a roadster was parked, climbed into it. The car moved away.



"He Really Adores You—Looks Up to You!"

The next morning Kezia came downstairs about noon, fresh and smiling. She came to her mother in the library and extended a glove to her. "Just a tiny hole, Mother. Want to mend it for me? It's the only pair that's clean. I told Anna to wash them yesterday—but her only answer was a dirty look! So I've been industrious this morning, washed four pairs, and numerous stockings."

Fluvanna took the glove, threaded a needle.

"Where were you last night, my dear?"

Kezia took a step back and shot her a look. "Just over to Emmy's," she said coldly.

"Who drove you over?"

The girl gave her a guarded glance.

"Kezia, whom are you meeting that you won't bring to the house? I happened to see you get into a car," Fluvanna stopped and pressed her hand to her side.

"I won't be questioned about every little thing I do!"

"It's not a little thing; it's a very serious thing. If there is some reasonable explanation, why don't you give it to me?"

"I can't."

"Why can't you?"

"It's someone whom you wouldn't allow at the house—so there!"

"My dear, surely you know that I'd rather allow you to have anyone—anyone—at the house, than have you picked up on street corners!"

"Mother, darling," said Kezia with hurt innocence and touching appeal, "you won't scold me if I tell you?"

"No."

"I probably shouldn't have started, and at first it was only in fun. But now it's real. He cares for me instead of her!" She smiled quiveringly; a tear squeezed out from the mist in her eyes, rolled over her cheek. She knelt by her mother's chair, laid her head on her arm. "You understand, you dear understanding mother—you're not hurt? And now if you know you'll allow him to come to the house—as you promised you would! . . . He really adores you—looks up to you!"

Burgos, "First City" of Rebel Spain, Has Intriguing History

Venerable Place Was Once the Capital of Old Castile.

Burgos, "capital" of rebel Spain, while new to the ears of present-day observers, has played an important part in the Spain of the past, says a bulletin from the Washington, D. C., headquarters of the National Geographic Society.

"Burgos, with only 32,000 inhabitants, rises from the heart of a rolling plateau about 130 miles due north of Madrid," continues the bulletin.

"As capital of the province of Burgos, it was normally a quiet city which the hard-working farmers, shepherds and foresters in the province used as their market place. Irrigated fields form green patchwork along the valley of the Arlanzon river, but much of the district surrounding the city is arid and barren like parts of the tableland of Mexico. Where water is available, however, good crops thrive—chiefly grains and chick peas.

Once Capital of Old Castile.

"While Burgos may have no boast as to high rank among urban centers on the Iberian peninsula, it is rich in history and in architectural treasures. Until 1087, when the royal residence was moved to Toledo, it was the capital of Old Castile. It is hinted that the crumbling castle above the city is one of the main reasons for the name of Castile.

"Even after the transfer of the royal residence, Burgos was still the scene of much royal pomp, splendor, and treachery. Several kings were crowned there, and some were born within its walls. Perhaps Burgos' most notorious son was King Pedro the Cruel, who was reputed to decorate his rooms with the heads of his victims.

Columbus Welcomed Here.

"Columbus, returning from his second expedition to the fabled New World, was welcomed by Fernando and Isabella in that palatial residence of old Burgos, the Casa de Cordon. The building still spreads its stone front across one side of the Plaza de Libertad.

"Royal marriages attracted to Burgos the pageantry of medieval chivalry from more than one nation. England sent a Twelfth-century princess there to become a Spanish queen, and later came an English king and a French duke to claim Spanish wives.

"In Burgos was born El Cid, the national hero of Spain in the struggle to reconquer the country from the Moors. The hilltop castle, then a magnificent stronghold, was the scene of his marriage to Ximena, who is buried with him in the Cathedral. One of the town's saddest days was that of their hero's return, when all doors were closed against him by the jealous king's command, and the grieving populace had to do their hero-worshiping silently from their windows.

City Is Battle Scarred.

"Remnants of warlike days survive in the city. The castle, demolished by the French after it had successfully resisted the forces of the mighty Wellington, flaunts its ruins from the hill. Four fortified gates remain, as well as a pleasant walkway, called the Paseo de los Cubos, the Promenade of the Tubs, because it passes a row of tublike circular bastions of the old wall.

"On the outskirts of Burgos stands the convent of Las Huelgas, to which only noble women were admitted. Its abbess for 500 years ranked second only to the queen of Spain, and had power of life and death, 'the gallows and the knife,' over all who came within her jurisdiction."

YOU CAN ALWAYS GET TO TOWN

with Firestone GROUND GRIP TIRES

GROUND GRIP TIRES bring a new freedom to the farmer—freedom to go anywhere, any time, in any weather. No longer do bad roads, snow and thaws mean isolation.

In deep snow, mud or sand, Firestone Ground Grip Tires go right through without spinning or stalling — you can always get to town.

The Firestone Ground Grip Tire was developed to overcome the difficulties of winter transportation on the farm. Firestone engineers, working under the personal direction of Harvey S. Firestone on his Columbiana, Ohio, farm, tested and proved the Ground Grip Tire under the worst possible weather and road conditions. This tire is so different in design and so superior in performance that a patent on it was issued by the United States Patent Office. The heavy rubber lugs of the tread are without equal for traction. They take hold and keep going where other tires get stuck — and you don't need chains.

Don't let bad roads and bad weather keep you isolated this winter. See your nearby Firestone Implement Dealer, Firestone Tire Dealer or Firestone Auto Supply and Service Store today.

Over the Hills to Oregon

Over the hills to Oregon
The sweetest place I know.
No frost can ever bite you
And neither can the snow.
The rain will make you happy
The sun will make you shine.
The hills will make you lonesome
But friends you'll always find.

The birds are all singing
The grass is turning green.
The mountains make the prettiest sigth
That I have ever seen.
I have been rather lonesome
But tears will never pay.
So I keep looking homeward.
Over the hills far away.

Four months we have been in Oregon
And another is near at hand.
Then it will be five months
That we have been in this lonesome land.
Keep your mind off Oregon
And all the very rest.
Of all the things you keep in mind
Forget the lonely west.

Marilyn Mae Hagen Died

The whole community was saddened on Sunday afternoon when little Marilyn Hagen passed away. She had been ill only a few days and her passing was a shock to everyone.

Marilyn Mae Hagen, only child of Arnold and Verna Hagen, was born on November 27, 1933 at Thief River Falls. She was baptised at the John Hagberg home on February 4, 1934 by Rev. L. M. Redal. Her sponsors were Mr. and Mrs. Jesse Sorum and Mr. and Mrs. Dennis Wegge.

She passed away at the Physicians Hospital at Thief River Falls on Sunday, January 17 following an operation for ruptured appendix which she underwent on Thursday, January 14.

She was a member of the primary class of the Nazareth Lutheran Sunday School.

At the time of her death, she was 3 years 2 months and 22 days.

Left to mourn her loss are her parents; grandparents, Mr. and Mrs. John Hagberg of Holt, and and Mr. and and Mrs. T. A. Hagen of Grand Forks; 9 uncles, Roy Hagberg of Holt, George Hagen of Devils Lake, N. D., Joe and Roy Hagen of Wisconsin Rapids, Wis., Helmer Hagen of North Platte, Neb., Herman Hagen of Janesville, Wis., Wilmer, Carl and Alfred Hagen of Grand Forks; 4 aunts, Mrs. Jesse Sorum of Holt; Mrs. Walmer Risberg of Gonvick, Mrs. Dennis Wegge of Holt, and Oline Hagen of Janesville, Wis.

Funeral services were conducted for Marilyn yesterday on the 10th wedding anniversary of her parents, at the Nazareth Lutheran Church, with Rev. T. C. L. Hanson officiating.

The pall bearers were Arthur Holmgren of Glyndon, Jerome Sorum, Roy Hagberg and Russel Sanoden. Four girls carried flowers, They were: Gloria Risberg of Gonvick, Jean Sorum, Ruby Werner, and Betty Lou Lorentson.

Interment was made in the Ridge cemetery.

M. E. A. Program

That every child everywhere, may have an equal opportnnity to learn is the basis of the educational legislative program which the Minnesota Education Association presented to the legislature for consideration at this session.

The five-point program sponsored by the M. E. A. asks: Continued support for education through state appropriation, rotention of the income tax for schools; payment of state aids in full: enactment of a bill for continuing contracts for teachers; and a study of school law looking toward recodification.

In a letter to legislators, Walter B. Englund, M. E. A. field director, declared that since youth is America's greatest asset and must be developed, there can be no retrenchment in the support of education, that revenue now going to the support of our public schools must not be diverted to other purposes.

Mr. Englund pointed out that the continuing contract bill would take no power from the local Board of Education in the selection and retention of teachers, but that it does limit the power of dismissal by requiring majority action by that body in order to terminate a teacher's contractual relation with the school district. "Its effect will be to stabilize the school situation and to promote that quiet school-community atmosphere under which a child can best be educated."

Dr. Lynde made call to the L. R. Larson home on Wednesday, Mrs. Larson and Rosemond are confined to bed with "Flu" and Ruggles has pneumonia. Mrs. Wm. Paskewitz is staying there taking care of them.

Match Good for 600 Lights

A rival of the match invented by an Austrian scientist, is a lighting-stick capable of being used 600 times. Its stone-like stem is made up of chemicals, and burning gases develop when it is struck. As the burning gases raise the temperature, nitrogen gas is released in sufficient quantity to choke the flame after allowing time to light a fire or a cigarette.

Soil Conservation Program

In the building of the 1937 Soil Conservation Program four objectives were considered and they are as follows:

1. Safeguard soil against exploitation.

2. Enable agriculture to provide for the farmers family a living standard comparable to that enjoyed by the other three-fourths of the country's population.

3. Enable agriculture to contribute it's share to the business and industry of the nation thru possessing an adequate and stable farm buying power.

4. Supply the nation with food and fiber in abundance, but not in such excess as to penalize the farmer and through him the national economy.

The 1937 program differs from 1936 in that for this year there are two basis set, a soil depleting and a soil conserving base. The soil conserving base is the difference between the crop acres on the farm and the acres in the soil depleting base.

The classification of crops differ from the 1936 program in that this year a neutral classification has been added to the soil depleting and the soil conserving classes. Summer fallow in 1937 if started before June 1, 1937 is always neutral as is 1937 seedings of soil conserving crops, if seeded alone or with one half normal seeding of nurse crop, if killed out due to conditions beyond the operator's control.

Because of very severe drought this year idle land and emergency forage crops such as oats for hay and millet may be considered neutral up to the difference between the old seedings of soil conserving crops and the soil conserving base. If the acerage of idle crop land and oats for hay or millet exceeds this difierence then whatever is greater than the difference becomes soil depleting.

The payments differ somewhat from 1936. In Marshall County a payment of $4.80 will be paid for each acre by which the soil depleting base is decreased with 15% of decrease of soil depleting base being the maximum upon which payment will be made. In addition to this a payment of $2.40 will be paid for each acre of this decrease which is devoted to the new seeding of a soil conserving crop not to exceed 15% of base. In addition to this there will be a payment for the seeding of legumes and grasses, which cannot exceed $1.00 per acre for each acre of the soil conserving base plus each acre on which $4.80 is paid plus 1936 potato acerage.

Meetings have been held in the county to discuss this program further and to elect committees for 1937.

A number of farmers attended the meeting held here yesterday.

State Conservation News

With the exception of scattered areas in the western and sonthwestern parts of the state plenty of natural food for game is still avaiable, according to Frank Blair, state superintendent of game propagation.

Winter conditions so far are classed as normal in about 75 percent of the state. Only eight game wardens have asked for grain for artificial feeding. The Division of Game and Fish is discouraging artificial feeding of birds unless absolutely necessary

Nearly 700 acres of buckwheat and millet have been planted in 16 counties in the northwestern part of the state. The presence of this additional natural food will undoubtedly be of great benefit for our upland game birds.

Mr. Blair emphasized that pheasants are extremely hardy and seldom require artificial feeding. He warned that highways should not be used for artificial feeding. Highway feeding, in addition to the danger from traffic, gives poachers a good opportunity for hunting by car.

That is what is covered in our Weekly News Review feature each week. It is an interpretation of the events of each week that are making the history of the nation and the world. It is prepared by Edward W. Pickard, one of the highly trained newspaper observers of the nation, and syndicated to a limited number of newspapers in the different states. It is the best feature of this character that goes to American readers from any source. You can make it the foundation of your discussion of world events with friends.

Lumber Jacks Strike

Axes are no longer swinging in the tall timbers this week as 3,500 lumber jacks are out on strike. Declaring that eating their meals out-of-doors in below zero weather and bunking in not overclean beds in the same room with a hundred other lumber jacks are not conditions engendering the greatest health and comfort, the lumber jacks have asked for higher wages and a legislative investigation into their conditions.

In the meantime, the men have asked for relief until a settlement can be reached. Governor Benson indicated at a meeting of the State Executive Council last week that he was in favor of helping the men obtain relief. He said: "These men must not be permitted to go cold or hungry. It is our duty to see that they do not."

Safetygrams
BY FRED W. BRAUN
© The Safety Man

Business men find it good business to take inventory of stock around the first of the year. Maybe all of us should take inventory of ourselves and our driving habits as a new year begins.

An all time record for automobile accidents and deaths will probably be set in 1936. Some communities will show reductions, others will show increases. It's to be regretted that this will be true in spite of all the safety work that is being done.

We must resolve within ourselves to do better.

It's the human factor in automobile driving that causes the accidents. A smart driver, because of his driving skill, can usually get out of difficult situations without an accident. The safe driver just does not get into difficult situations in the first place. That's the difference.

Be a safe driver.

Rev. and Mrs. Hanson visited with Mrs O. E. Locken and family at Crookston on Tuesday.

—18—

Fluvanna gasped, as revelation came. "Kezzie! . . . Not Jerry?"

"I suppose we couldn't keep it much longer. You'd have heard. In fact I'm surprised Lizzie hasn't been over already, ranting to you!"

Fluvanna shook her head, gave a hopeless sound in her throat. "Don't you realize what you've done? It's not Lizzie—it's Ellen! The poor child had confided in me all spring. She was in love for the first time in her life! . . . Oh, Kezzie—Kezzie!"

Kezia drew her mother's hands down from her face, which she had covered. Her voice was light and winning. "Sweetest darling Mother, you'll allow him to come to the house? . . . You said you would! And you'll be nice to him when he comes?"

Fluvanna thought, "Was she really thinking of marrying him?"

"Yes, he may come to the house. There must be no more secret meetings."

"You lamb!" She kissed her mother. "And you'll not say anything to make him uncomfortable? He's very sensitive. He said it almost made him shriek the way the Pendletons looked down on him!"

It was Fluvanna's swift thought that receiving Jerry casually and pleasantly might remove the piquancy of the situation as far as Kezia was concerned. "I'll be careful of his—sensitiveness," she replied.

Kezia looked at her doubtfully. Then, "I knew I could count on you to understand," she murmured. "I'll go out and help Anna get the lunch on the table."

She went out directly lunch was over. About one o'clock it began to rain, a cold drizzle. The rain was too late to help the baked farms and gardens, but was soothing to taut nerves, strained with too much heat and sunlight. Fluvanna wandered about the house rather forlornly.

She would take a hot bath, and then a nap. No, she would lie down first. That odd pain which she had so often lately, was coming back. She went into her room and closed the window where the rain beat in. Someone came in the front door without ringing the bell. She heard Dorrie's voice downhome?"

"Up here, Dorrie." She sat down suddenly in a chair, overcome with weakness.

"I brought you a cake I made myself," said Dorrie.

"How delicious that will be! You're so thoughtful, Dorrie." Dorrie was a good child.

"I haven't had a maid lately. I've been doing everything myself." Dorrie seemed to seek approval.

"Did Tillie get another place?"

"She had to go home because her mother was sick. I wanted to do it . . . thought I'd feel better."

Fluvanna bit her lip with the sudden pain, closed her eyes. After a moment she heard Dorrie's voice, sounding as if it were far-off, "You look so strange."

She did not answer. Then seeing Dorrie's eyes fixed on her in a kind of fright, Fluvanna answered with an effort: "Don't mind me. I'm terribly upset and worried."

"You know about it?" asked Dorrie, a little sharply.

Fluvanna nodded. Dorrie must have heard about Kezia and Jerry too. That was the reason for this visit, the cake was an offering of sympathy. "It's all so sad—so cruel." She sighed.

Something leaped in Dorrie's face; something rebellious and unkind. "Hugh told you! He said he hadn't!"

"No, not Hugh. I just heard it today. I suspected something—things puzzled me. I asked Kezia. It took her a long time, but finally she told me."

Dorrie's lip curled. "Kezia!"

Why did Dorrie speak in that tone? Why did she stare at her with such a hostile gaze? Suddenly the pain in Fluvanna's chest gripped her; her heart began to beat with quick hammer - like strokes. Faster and faster until the pain seemed to be bursting her lungs. The room revolved swiftly like a whirling black disk with a circle of light at the center. The circle of light became smaller and smaller until the blackness blotted it out altogether. She knew nothing more.

Later she became conscious of Dr. Carey holding her wrist, his finger on her pulse. His face was grave.

"I must have fainted," she murmured.

"You must have indeed."

A day or so later he said, "You'll have to face it, Fluvanna; that heart of yours is a leaky old organ. With care it might see you through some little time—a year, two—three. And then again . . ."

She listened to him with no feeling of shock. Had not some inner presentiment told her that it would not be long? "And then again——?"

"Three months—six months."

"I won't burden my children with such news. Death shouldn't be heralded months in advance. It's an individual—matter." She smiled a little.

So her son and daughghers only heard that the fainting attack was brought on by exhaustion and the hot weather. There was some talk of a trip and a change of climate, but this Fluvanna vetoed and the matter was dropped.

CHAPTER IX

As the weeks wore by Hugh experienced the disintegrating effects of split emotions. Try as he would he could not reconcile the situation into ease of mind. It was like a broken dish which had been unskilfully mended. You saw at once the ugly dark line where it had been joined together. Grudgingly he admitted that Dorrie seemed to be making an effort to efface her conduct; she was conciliatory, consulted his wishes in a new way. This last was disconcerting for it continually reminded him of the reason. She had been wont to demand, not to appeal. She did not try to get another maid when Tillie left, studied a cook book, and had new dishes for dinner. She carefully recounted where she had been each day, as if to reassure him.

He had a new wife—but at what price?—he told himself. Although his longing for her did not cease, became more powerful as he became more aware of it, it was a hideous thing, humiliating him because he was helpless before it. He was often short and curt with her, then to make up for it, was carefully polite.

One day he went into a new restaurant for lunch. The owner had achieved the synthetic atmosphere of a Moorish inn, stone floors, rude fireplaces, and jugs before a drinking fountain in the wall. The place was dimly lighted and it was not until he had ordered that he saw Ellen Pendleton eating luncheon with Ronny Wakes. They occupied a red leather wall seat just opposite him.

Ellen was talking animatedly to Ronny, her frequent laughter a little feverish in its gaiety. Preoccupied with his own affairs, he had seen and heard nothing of Ellen for some time, and when Ronny left the table to telephone, Hugh crossed over.

"Hello, stranger. I haven't seen you all summer."

"It has been a long time."

Hugh fumbled. "Everything going well?" he inquired after a pause.

"Everything."

"I must be getting back to the office. By the way, you're with Ronny. How come?"

Ellen's lashes swept her cheeks, then she raised her eyes unflinchingly. "I suppose because he asked me."

"I'm squelched! But I thought—I was given to understand—that your interest lay in another direction. That soulful young chap, Jerry."

He saw an odd thing. A quiver of pain, so sentient, so defenseless, crossed her face that he thought she was going to faint. Then she was controlled; she even smiled. "Haven't you heard? His interest lies in another direction."

"I haven't heard a thing," he replied frowning. "Mind if I say he has rotten taste?"

She laughed on a low note. "Loyal as ever! . . . But—people change."

"Yes—they do," said Hugh slowly. His own predicament made him more alive to the remote suffering in her eyes. "Call on me if there's anything . . ."

Ellen shook her head firmly. "Thanks—there's nothing."

Ronny came back from the telephone with apologies. Hugh spoke to him and then took his departure. He found himself wishing he did not have to go back to the office; the work had gone flat to him and he found himself struggling to concentrate on the simplest problems. When he hung up his hat, Miss Ruskin passed with a paper in her hand. "Mr. Sloan wants to see you, Mr. Marsh."

He went into the office of the president. Sloan was telephoning but he nodded him to a chair. "Marsh," he began briskly when he hung up the receiver, "how would you like to take a vacation?"

Hugh felt a faint perspiration break out on his forehead. "You mean you're not satisfied with my work?"

Sloan gave a short laugh. "Look in the glass, my boy. You've been off color for a month. Run away for a week or so, play golf, keep out in the open air, forget the business. You're heading for something—an illness, I would say—if you don't snap out of it."

The thought clicked in Hugh's brain that twice lately he had heard of men sent on vacations by thoughtful companies, men who in a few days received a wire that their services would no longer be needed. "I'm all right," he answered brusquely. "I feel better working."

His superior played with his fountain pen. "Something bothering you?" he inquired.

Hugh did not answer.

"Financial?"

"No."

Offers New Opportunities

THE modern woman who sews is really an enviable person. She has at her finger-tips an endless array of fashions from which to choose for her own and her daughters' wardrobes. Today's trio affords her new opportunities in several size ranges; in fact, there's something here for the mature figure, size 42, right on down to the tiny tot who just manages to fill an "age 4."

Pattern 1987— This diminutive frock is for Miss Four - To-Twelve. Its easy lines, flaring skirt, and pretty sleeves are perhaps second only to its thru'-the-machine-aptness, so far as the woman who sews is concerned. But this is all too obvious to mention. Better cut this pattern twice for all 'round practical reasons. It's intriguing in taffeta—a winner in gingham and linen. It comes in sizes 4, 6, 8, 10, and 12 years. Size 6 requires 1⅞ yards of 39 inch material plus ⅜ yard contrasting.

Pattern 1211— It is a smart frock like this that will turn the most immune young lady into an ardent seamstress almost over night. And rightly so, for it's plain to see how becoming are its princess lines, how flattering the wide shoulders and slim waist, yes, and how spicy the swing skirt. A pretty and colorful motif can be had in the use of velvet for the buttons and belt. Monotone broadcloth, black or royal blue, with the collar and cuffs of white linen, is a startlingly chic material for this model. It is available in sizes 12 to 20 (30 to 40 bust). Size 14 requires 2¾ yards of 54 inch fabric plus ¾ yeard of 39 inch contrasting.

Pattern 1210— Which would you have, Madam, an artistic smock or a glamorous house coat? This pattern allows you to make this interesting choice and it has what you'll need to make either of the models illustrated here. The house coat has become womankind's most desired "at home" attire; so rather than be among the minority, why not turn your talents to this princess model—you'll have it complete in a mere few hours and think of the countless days it will stand you in good stead as a really good looking wardrobe asset. It is designed in sizes 14 to 20 (32 to 42 bust). Size 16 (in full length) requires 5⅝ yards of 39 inch material plus 3¼ yards of bias piping and ¼ yard contrasting material for pocket.

Send your order to The Sewing Circle Pattern Dept., Room 1020, 211 W. Wacker Dr., Chicago, Ill. Price of patterns, 15 cents (in coins) each.

Sore Throat Pains
DUE TO COLDS
Eased Instantly

1. Crush and stir 3 Bayer Aspirin tablets in ⅓ glass of water.
2. GARGLE thoroughly — throw your head way back, allowing a little to trickle down your throat.
3. Repeat gargle and do not rinse mouth, allow gargle to remain on membranes of the throat for prolonged effect.

Just Gargle This Way with Bayer Aspirin

Here is the most amazing way to ease the pains of rawness of sore throat resulting from a cold we know you have ever tried.

Crush and dissolve three genuine BAYER ASPIRIN tablets in one-third glass of water. Then gargle with this mixture twice, holding your head well back.

This medicinal gargle will act almost like a local anesthetic on the sore, irritated membrane of your throat. Pain eases almost instantly; rawness is relieved.

Countless thousands now use this way to ease sore throat. Your doctor, we are sure, will approve it. And you will say it is marvelous.

Get the real BAYER ASPIRIN at your druggist's by asking for it by its full name — not by the name "aspirin" alone.

Mind Your Peas — and Q's

OR don't mind your Q's—they're not important. Peas, however, have a very important part in the business of preparing summer-time meals, so it is well that you mind not only the can sizes but the pea sizes as well. Canners provide cans of convenient size for various uses—nature provides peas of convenient sizes for various dishes.

For vegetable salad sandwiches use the smallest size peas; for salads, or for creamed casserole dishes, use the medium size peas, sifted or fine, or early June. For soups or chowders you can use the less expensive, large peas. These are the marrow fat and telephone size.

Tiny Cans—and Tall

Keep on hand the various sized cans of peas, so that you may open a small one or a large one, according to the demands of your recipe. From the tiniest to the tallest they range as follows: 8-ounce, 11-ounce, 15½-ounce, 1 pound 4-ounces, 1 pound 10-ounces.

The following tested recipes consist of summer dishes with peas, which are especially good:

Salmon and Pea Shortcake: Melt three tablespoons butter, add four tablespoons flour and stir until smooth. Add one and one-half cups of milk slowly, then add the liquor from one No. 2 can of peas and the liquor from one tall can of salmon. Stir constantly until smooth and creamy. Season to taste and add the salmon and peas. Split hot baking powder biscuits, and pour the salmon and pea mixture between and on top of the biscuits. This serves six.

Pea, Cheese and Nut Salad: Marinate two cups of peas in one-fourth cup of French dressing for at least one hour. Drain, add one-half cup of diced American cheese, one-half cup of chopped nuts and mix with mayonnaise. Serve on lettuce. This serves six.

"Injuns"

THOSE who now-a-days seldom hear about or see a real Indian and, therefore, rather naturally take it for granted that our Indian population has dwindled to a mere hand ful probably will be somewhat astonished to learn that there still are more than 343,000 of them within our borders.

Beginning with Ababco and running through the alphabet past such better known names as Cherokee, Chinook, Choctaw, Crow, Flathead, Fox, Hopi, Iroquois, Kickapoo, Mohawk, Navaho, Osage, Pawnee, Pueblo, Seneca, Sioux, Tonkawa, Ute, Winnebago and Yuma down to Zuni, and including many lesser-known bands such as Cathlakaheckit, Chilliec-kittequad, Kwethtlmanish, Mishikhwutetmune, Paspikawati, Prinashanwagotsko, Tuziyammos and Yaudanchi, a bulletin issued by the office of Indian affairs at Washington lists some 344 tribes still in existence.

Each of our forty-eight states and the District of Columbia has some citizens who are still classed as Indians. Oklahoma leads the list with about 110,000—approximately one-third of the total number. Other states which rank high are, Arizona with 43,827, California with 18,888, Minnesota with 13,326, Montana with 12,648, Washington with 10,920 and Wisconsin with 10,493. Vermont has but 24, West Virginia 7 and Delaware 2.

According to the bulletin, Uncle Sam conducts 184 well-attended Indian schools, while some 80,000 additional Indian scholars are enrolled in various state public schools. In addition, more than 5,000 are provided for in mission and private schools.

Outlook Justifies State Participation In New York Fair

Whalen Voices Opinion in Inviting Governor and People to the 1939 Exposition

NEW YORK, (Special).—In a letter of invitation to the governors of 47 states, Grover Whalen, President of the New York World's Fair 1939 Corporation, points out that the commercial consequences of the international exposition under construction in New York City are so great and important that they alone would justify the active participation of every state in the nation.

"Fifty million persons from every walk in life, from every state in the United States, from every country in the world, are expected to attend the Fair," writes Mr. Whalen. "The great American market with its tremendous consumer purchasing power will be represented by these visitors. They will comprise a true cross-section of America."

The World's Fair, according to Mr. Whalen, will be a magnificent spectacle, entertaining and instructive. It will attempt to answer the questions: "What kind of a world have we built? What kind of a world are we building? What kind of a world can we build?" With collateral improvements, it will represent a total investment of more than $125,000,000 by the Fair Corporation and the governmental, industrial and other participants. The Fair site park is a tract of 1216½ acres, almost at the geographical and population centre of New York City.

Construction of buildings and roads, grading, dredging, planting and landscaping are already under way, based upon a schedule which calls for completion of all construction operations before January 1, 1939, to allow four months for final decorations and installation of exhibits preparatory to the opening of the Fair on April 30.

The opening date commemorates the inauguration, on April 30, 1789, of George Washington as the first President of the United States.

In the government area, and near an imposing federal hall to be erected by the United States Government, the Fair will provide a "Hall of States" in which the significant contributions of each state in laying the foundations for the better World of Tomorrow can be proudly displayed, says Mr. Whalen.

His letter supplements an invitation to participate in the Fair extended to the governors on November 30 by Governor Herbert H. Lehman of the host state of New York. Governor Lehman pointed out that the State of New York has already appropriated, to date, $2,130,000 for commencement of construction of boulevards, service roads, bridges, and certain other basic improvements the State will make at the exposition site or its approaches. The New York legislature, further, during 1936 passed an act creating the New York World's Fair Commission of 18 members and providing funds in aid of this body's preparation of plans for a state building and exhibit and for active state participation in the Fair.

The Elementary Algebra tests must have been hard. The freshies say the only part of the problem that wont come out right is the answer.

The Economic Geography class took their semester test on Wednesday.

The impersonations by English 2 class was very much enjoyed. Especially by the Juniors.

It's peculiar what goes on in the halls around here. This one was heard around here.

Hundreds Die In Flood

The dead, in the mightiest flood ever to strike this nation, reached into tragic hundreds yesterday, and the army bolstering the levees defenses of the Mississippi, prepared -should the worst come- to evacuate the endangered along its course.

In the Ohio valley, where so many had died, particularly at Louisville which could only guess at the number of its fatalties, the worst appeared over at most points. Louisville, Cincinnati and scores of other smaller cities, however, still faced cold, water shortage and disease. Influenza was reported at Paducah, Ky.

The homeless in 11 states were estimated by the Red Cross at nearly 1,000,000; the property damage conservatively was estimated at above $400,000,000.

Minn. Low In T B Death Rate

Minnesota's death rate from tuberculosis is one of the ten lowest in the United States according to recently published figures.

This comparison between the states and their relative immunity from tuberculosis is noted in a bulletin from the Public Health Education Committee of the Minn. State Medical Association issued today.

Minnesota's rate for 1935, the last year for which complete figures are now available was 35.6. Wyoming and Nebraska showed the lowest ratings, 22.4 each, North Dakota's rate was 24.1 and Iowa' 26. Oregon came close to Minnesota with a 34.5 rate and New Hampshire was 35.5.

Other states ranged from rates of 40 upward, the states with the highest ratings being those where the tuberculosis sick habitually congregate in search of health, Colorado, Arizona, California. The District of Columbia with its large negro population showed the astonishingly high rate of 102.2.

The states with the smallest amount of tuberculosis are those that are prevailing rural with scattered populations.

Minnesota with several large cities to bring down it's rate still managed to show an excellent record, in the opioion of the physicians.

Excellent facilities for care of the tuberculous sick and a very through campaign of education about the infectiousness of the disease and the new means of discovering and treating it early are credited by the bulletin for this record. The importance of continuing without interruption the support of the Christmas Seal campaign of education was emphasized by the doctors.

Hemlocks Found In Itasca

Four hemlock trees, an exceedingly rare species in Minnesota, were recently discovered by a timber operator in Itasca county north of Nashwauk.

The timber operator agreed to permit the rare trees to remain and they will be preserved by the state division of forestry.

The so-called hemlock belt ends in western Wisconsin and very few of the trees have been found in Minnesota. Five hemlocks were recently found in Mille Lacs county near Malmo. Three are growing in Jay Cook park, Carlton county.

A small number of hemlock seedlings are growing in the state forestry nursery at Badoura. Hemlock bark is used in tanning leather.

What do you for frost bites? What are the symptoms of frost bites?

The affected part of the body becomes painfully cold and then suddenly the sense of feeling is gone. The affected part becomes white or grayish in color.

Keep the patient away from fire or warmly heated room.

Apply palm of hand, wool, or fur to affected part.

Massage the parts very gently then apply cold water.

Apply ointment as you would to a burn because frost bite is the same in effect.

The object of the treatment is to bring the frozen part of the body back to normal temperature gradually and to restore circulation.

New 4-H Club Project

A new 4-H club project, meal planning and food preparation, which was inaugurathd in 1936, was received enthusiastically by club members, states Miss Amy Wessel, state club agent, University Farm, St. Paul.

Although the work was started only in April of last year, 933 girls representing 38 different counties participated in the new project. From reports of the club members themselves and county extension agents, it was found to be one of the most interesting projects of the year, says Miss Wessel.

The project required that a member plan and prepare 7 family breakfasts, 7 family suppers, 7 box lunches or picnics, and plan and be responsible for preparing 9 consecutive meals. Miss Wessel states that from the time the project began in April up to the county fair time, approximately 31,000 meals were prepared by members enrolled in the project. A large number of girls gave demonstrations at their local club or community gatherings on a number of food preparation methods. The preparation of three types of salad was demonstrated by Miss Marjorie Matheson, Thief River Falls, who was judged the state winning meal preparation demonstrator for 1936. Three girls from each of the four club districts in the state received trips to the 1936 Minnesota state fair on a basis of demonstrations given at sub-district contests, and records kept of wook done in their homes.

State Club agents who are conducting the new project urge the participation of all girls who are 15 years or older and who qualify for the project. Information regarding the work may be obtained from the local club leader or the county extension agent.

Janice Elizabeth, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. S. Risberg of Gonvick, was baptised last Thursday at the John Hagberg home. Mr. and Mrs. R. L. Adams of Grand Forks and Mr. and Mrs R. A. Werner were sponsors.

WISDOM ROOSTS

This wise owl has a lugubrious air about him and no wonder. The bird is deeply attached to Charles Kornet, of New York city, who found him in Bronx park and made a pet of him. But Charles, unable to care for the bird, took it to the Bronx zoo, where he is pictured just before he said good-by to his feathered pal. The owl likes his perch, which provides a means of gauging his size, which is 4 inches tall; weight, 8 ounces. The owl is one of the smallest of its kind on record.

St. Paul—The Minnesota State Fair, now at the peak of its success, may be extended to two weeks next fall, for the first time in its 75-year history. Unprecedented success of the 1936 fair, which set an all-time attendance record of 636,484, is the reason given by Lee M. Duluth—State relief officials have agreed to reopen the Grover Conzet transient camp near Grand Marais to house and feed 400 homeless northern Minnesota lumberjacks as their strike, showed first signs of action toward settlement. Several small operators are reported ready to accept the terms of the strikers. About 3500 men have quit work, Fred LeQuer, president of the timber workers' union, claimed. Caring for the strikers has become a major problem since most of the lumberjacks are without homes. When the strike was called, union officials planned to have the strikers occupy the camps and thus eliminate the housing problem. Most operators, however, paid their men and told them to leave. Camp supplies were cut off.

St. Paul—Seed buyers are cautioned to read carefully the labels on seed containers by C. P. Bull, directors of the seed and weed inspection division of the state department of agriculture. "Certified" seeds must be certified for some particular purpose, such as purity and freedom from weed seeds, before being of value to the buyer, he said. The label "U. S. Verified," means the United States office has verified the seed only as to its origin and not as to purity, weed content or termination, Mr. Bull pointed out.

Home Heating Hints

By John Barclay
Heating Expert

THERE'S an art in refueling a furnace fire that enables you to get the most heat at the least cost. There's more to it than just scooping up a few shovelfuls of coal and tossing it into the firepot. The economical way is simple.

Shake the grates gently when necessary. Don't do it vigorously and shake a lot of live coals into the ashpit. When you see a slight red glow in the ashpit, stop shaking. Then pull a mound of live coals from the rear to the front of the firebox, just inside the firedoor, using your shovel or a hoe. Don't disturb the ash under the live coals. That gives you a fire bed sloping down from the edge of the door to the rear.

Now, shovel a charge of fresh coal into the hollow toward the back of the furnace, being careful to leave a mound of live coals in front. These live coals ignite the gases rising from the contact of the fresh and hot coal, causing them to burn.

Finally, when these gases are thoroughly burned, clean the ashpit and reset the dampers. The turn damper in the smoke pipe, remember, should be nearly closed. The check damper should be entirely closed. The ashpit damper should be open. Open the slide in the firedoor only about the width of a wooden match.

CAPITOL NEWS REVIEW

Governor Benson has accepted the recommendations of L. P. Zimmerman, state public relief administrator, of $17,000,000 for direct relief needs for the next binneium. Mr. Zimmerman's recommendations are embodied in the Administration's relief bll pendng before the Legislature. The bill has drawn severe fire from Senator Rockne and other anti-relief minded conservatives. In a statement to newspapers, Senator Rockne said that $5,000,000 for the biennium should be sufficient.

Much has been made by the conservatives over the apparent difference in Mr. Zimmerman's estimate of $17,000,000 and the $10,000,000 estimate of Paul A. Rasmussen, state budget commissioner. However, their estimates quite reconcilable.

At a conference with Mr. Zimmerman last week, Mr. Rasmussen explained that his figures did not include estimates for such emergency purposes as drouth relief and the state assuming any part of the burden which some of the financially embarrassed counties are unable to bear. Mr. Rasmussen stated that his $10,000,000 figure is the amount he fixed which could be paid from the general revenue fund for relief purposes on a pay-as-you-go basis, but did not attempt to set the actual relief needs of the state. Otherwise there are very few, if any, differences between the two estimates.

The Administration's program for increase in the income tax is now before the Legislature. The increases are principally in the higher income brackets. If passed by the Legislature, the bill will increase the state's revenue in excess of $7,000,000 yearly.

Tax experts agree that a tax on incomes is the most just and esuitable tax system yet devised, carrying out the theory of taxation in accordance with ability to pay.

All monies derived from the income tax in this state are ear-marked for school purposes. In a sense, therefore, an income tax acts as a replacement tax, reducing the local tax load.

Mr. Roy Dunn, conservative House floor leader, made complaint last week of what he called unfair treatment given conservatives by the liberal-controlled House majority in the matter of committee appointments.

Of all persons, Mr. Dunn should be the last to make such a complaint. If he took occasion to compare the treatment given liberals when his conservative group controlled the House to the treatment now accorded conservatives by the liberal majority he will discover that the liberals indeed have been charitable to his group.

In 1935, with conservatives in control, the liberals received four appointments to the civil administration committee while in 1937 conservatives were given five appointments; five liberals in 1935 were placed on the committee on agriculture, while six conservatives are on that committee at the present time; in 1935 four liberals were on the appropriations committee and four conservatives are now serving on that committee; the general legislation committee in 1935 found four liberals as members, whereas six conservatives are now serving; on the markets and marketing committee of 1935 only seven liberals were given positions, where 15 conservatives are now on that committee; four liberals served on the municipal affairs committee in 1935 as compared to five conservatives at the present time.

Due to the large number of bills dealing with cooperatives, the Minnesota House has found it necessary to organize a new committee on cooperatives and cooperation. The chairman of the committee is John Cox of Becker.

While in Washington to attend the inauguration ceremonies of President Roosevelt, Governor Benson met with the Minnesota liberal delegation to map plans for effective cooperation in Washington on all matters in which the state is interested. The Minnesota liberal group has organized in an attempt to receive recognition in both the House and the Senate as a minority group. One of its first objectives will be to secure passage of the deficiency appropriation bill to maintain WPA on at least its present basis until the end of the fiscal year.

---

George Barton, sports editor of the Minneapolis Tribune assumed the role of interviewer of Joe Louis Negro prize fighter, when the latter appeared before the Minnesota Legislature last week.

Said Mr. Barton: "Do you want to fight Max Schmeling again?

Retorted Mr. Louis: "Certainly."

"Do you think you can beat Schmeling?"

"I will have to learn to keep my hands up first."

All of which shows that the Negro bomber has either a sense of humor or is quite realistic.

---

Also appearing before the Legislature was Miss Ellen Wilkinson, Labor Party member of the British Parliment. "We of the Labor Party of England," said Miss Wilkinson, "are frankly envious of the progressive government in Minnesota. Our desire is to do as well."

Miss Wilkinson added that among liberals of England the late Floyd B. Olson was considered one of America's outstanding men and his name has become "almost a byword for true liberalism."

"Liberal is as Liberal does. Let those who proclaim themselves as liberals accept a liberal program." Thus did John D. M. Hamilton, national chairman of the Republican Party, plead for a change in the party's political concepts at the 16th annual luncheon of the Women's National Republican Club.

In effect, Mr. Hamilton said: "Let us cease being liberals in our professions while reactionaries at heart. Let us change our hearts." This indeed is a very candid admission from the man who conducted the last Republican national campaign that the party's recent claims to liberalism were nothing but a sham and a fraud a confession that those who guide the destinies of the Republican Party today are still opposed to social security and progress of all kinds. Mr. Hamilton has confirmed what liberals in this state and in any other state have been saying all along the Republican Party was only spoofing when they said they were liberals. The results of the election show that the people did not believe them.

Mr. Hamilton now says that the people were right.

Minnesota Republicans have the opportunity to prove whether they are liberals at heart or not by the support they will give Governor Benson's liberal legislative program. If they go along with the program they will at least be able to enter the next campaign fortified against charges of false liberalism; if they do not the issues will again be clearly drawn as between liberalism and reaction.

A GREAT MIND IS AT REST

August R. Nyquist, (known by his many friends as Gust) is no more. His great mind has ceased to function in this material world. His death early on Sunday morning is a distinct loss to this entire section.

It is not only the City of Roseau that will feel the loss, neither is the loss felt by only friends, it is a loss to everybody in Northern Minnesota and a great deal wider than that.

Such a mind as he was endowed with is rare. For he was not only an inventor of National renown but he was a mechanic, an economist and a Philosopher, and perhaps greatest of all, a true friend.

From the poverty of pioneer parents and with only a fourth grade school education, he fought his way through to where he could view the sunshine of success and to where he could be truly regarded as the most succesful man in the Roseau Community.

As inventor and manufacturer of Electric Welding Rods his products are known to the entire mechanical world. His welding rods have found a market in almost every section of the globe where electric welding is practised on a large scale.

And his invention of the FAMOUS Welding Rods was not accidental, but because he understood chemistrp and metals and the effects of one upon the other. The science of metals seemed simple to him.

And he did not invent only one welding rod, but a number of welding rods. Shortly before his death he had completed another welding rod for which patents are being petitioned. These inventions are practically all for specialized work.

The Laboratory in which Gust Nyquist worked was not modern. It consisted of a steel welding slab in one corner of his shop on which were a number of tin cups in which he mixed the powdered material with which he fluxed the welding rod.

For months he would work around his shop as a mechanic or a welder, or giving orders to some of the crew of workers, which sometimes numbered more than ten. Or he would be making plans for some new features of the Arc-Heat furnaces, which heat so many of the buildings of his community and which are becoming known in a great many communities of this section.

Then after months of work, that was common to him, he would lay aside his common work and take to his laboratory. Often we stood at a distance and watched him as he pried into the secrets of the science of metals. And to watch him was interesting. Very carefully, the material, which looked like flour, would be measured from several packages and mixed with water. Then the material, which he called flux, would be brushed onto a steel covered copper or nickel rod and a bead welded unto a casting or piece of steel. Then a hammer and chisel would test the hardness of the bead. This testing would go on for days, and sometimes weeks, sometimes intermittenly for several months before the new welding rod had been created.

To Gust Nyquist, human society was a great laboratory. The law of balances would have to rule if Human Society was to function properly. His contention was that if someone collected more for services to society than such services were worth, then someone would receive less than their services were worth. One of his very apt illustrations was, "YOU CAN NOT TAKE MORE OUT OF A PAIL THAN IS PUT INTO THAT PAIL."

Rising from the poverty of pioneering parents he knew from actual experience what the pinch of poverty really was. The founding of his machine shop and manufacturing plant was not achieved in any bed of flowers. There were barriers that had to be surmounted that would have overwhelmed the average person.

He had faith in his convictions and the fortitude and ability to defend them. Calling him a Socialist, Communist or any other Bogey-man name meant nothing to him. Scientific methods of measurements would have to be the methods by which the fact or lack of fact of any argument or contention would be based.

Yes, he was a true progressive. He analyzed human society by scientific formula. If there were defects he used scientific formula in arriving at the cause of the defect. And scarcity midst overabundance was to him a serious economic defect.

The amount that one person had more of wealth of the Nation than that person could use would be reflected in one or a number of persons having correspondingly less than they needed, depending on how much more a person had of the worlds goods than was being utilized, he contended.

"For there must be a balance. If artificial methods of balance are utilized that in itself establishes the existence of economic defect. The fatc that money must be loaned into circulation in order to keep the wheels of commerce going is proof of economic defect, since interest paid on money so loaned takes money ou tof circulation which can find its way into the channels of trade and commerce only through the medium of further loans."

"The amounts of loans and extension of credit each year marks the extent to which our economic system goes out of balance during the year. Each depression marks the period when collateral for further extension of credits and loans has been used up and inflation and extension of credits by the government must be resorted to in order to start the wheels of commerce going. This artificial solution only extends to a future period the economic consequences of an unbalanced economic system."

Mr. Nyquist also contended that the great machinery of production and distribution must be Government and co-operatively owned if the social and economic system of our Nation is to balance. "For machines," he said, "can not consume goods, neither can they have children and live in homes. Therefore these machines must be owned by the Government, or by Co-operatives, in order that the masses may enjoy the fruits of the producing capacity of these machines and thus keep the economic structure in balance.

"The paying of wages to machines, or money, is the worship of material things and a carry-over of the Pagan Philosophies of bygone days which many who condemn Pagan Worship of old, aid and abett in this modern day and age."

What a treat it was to visit with Gust when he could relax. It was in fact an inspiration. And our thoughts shall often turn back to the last afternoon we spent together, which was January 18th, when he and his good wife called for a visit at our home, and it was while visiting that he was taken ill and was taken to the hospital less than an hour later.

While resting on the Davenport he extolled the philosophy of human Brotherhood citing many verses from the New Testament to prove that Christ recognized the need of Social and Economic Justice in order that His children might enjoy the fruits of Brotherhood.

Our friend Gust is gone. His great mind is stilled and his work is done. He has laid aside a mantle that it will be hard for anyone else to carry. While we mourn him as a friend we also mourn him because he was a great asset to this section of the State, as an Inventor, Manufacturer, a Thinker, Philosopher. We wished him well in this life and on the other side of that great divide we again wish him well. May his great service to humanity bring solace to those who mourn him.

Personal Chats

When a friend is still in good health and moving about amongst us we often fail to show the inner feeling of friendship that makes itself felt when we are brought face to face with the reality that such a friend has departed, that the great devide has been negotiated.

The void in which we are left brings many thought to our minds and we become lonesome; serious thoughts regarding the grim realities of life continue to come before the subconscious mind.

And how life is balanced and counter-balanced. Sorrow seems to fill a needed place in our lives. It seems to eradicate from our lives some of the weeds of bitterness and hate. Surely, there are counterbalances that shape our lives making us all nobler, if we heed the force of reality and common sense.

It is perhaps fitting that we should write a brief summary of our experiences during the first five years in the newspaper field, the 20th of January being the time that the fifth anniversary of the starting of the Northern Minnesota Leader at Roseau.

Then too February 20th will be the first anniversary of the starting of the Marshall County Star at Warren. These two newspapers have meant a great deal to the Farmer-Labor movement in the 67th Legislative district.

For the readers of both publications it will be interesting to know some the folks who played an important part inthe various stages of the development of; first the Leader at Roseau and then the Star at Warren.

To the people of the Roseau community John G. Holmstroms rugged figure is very familiar. Some of the people of Marshall County will remember when the fighting son of Vermland was a candidate for State Senator in 1918.

This is the first figure that appears on the scene. He started out in the fall of 1931 to rouse the people to the need of a Moratorium on farm mortgages and for the purpose of establishing a progressive newspaper in Roseau.

That is where our paths came close enough together to become acquainted. In his tour of the State for the Moratorium law he made the acquaintance of Harold Hagen, then editor of the Polk County Leader, and now secretary to Congressman R. T. Buckler. Hagen conferred with us with the result that the Leader at Roseau was started.

Many people subscribed to the Leader months before it was started. Among the first subscribers were Mr. Holmstrom, Fred Gross, P. G. Pederson, Emanuel Holm, Emil Mortenson and Sig Danielson. There are a number of others who also subscribed several months before but writing from Warren we have not the available records.

The beginning was eventful. We had no newspaper experience but lots of confidence. The first weeks the printing was done at Crookston and shipped to Roseau. Never having worked in a newspaper office the results held critics at bay.

Several feature articles caused many pleasing comments, while the full force of Mr. Holmstrom's aggressive personality was thrown behind the new Venture. Friends in every section of the County worked hard in getting subscribers during those trying times of 1932 to get new subscribers.

There appeared many interesting figures that will never be forgotten. The fairness of Israel Sjoberg, Roseau's leading merchant, was a source of great help and something that the Progressive people of Roseau County should not forget.

Other interesting figures that played an important part were: G. T. Nelson, the fiery energetic ex-Mission Minister; R. E. Boen, the slow spoken farmer from Malung; Ellis Grahn, the Banker-Farmer; O. E. Howg of Badger; Jalmer Wellen, of Moose; Victor Roseen, the Malung Bachelor; Martin Grefthen of Wannaska and a number of others who lent their moral and financial support.

C. O. Hyerdahl, the veteran Druggist, is another businessman who deserves to be remembered. He is a man who virtually understands the principles of Progressive Government. While many know him as a Democrat, he is known to his close friends as a real progressive and a friend of those who need a friend.

It was during our first days in Roseau that we began to observe Gust Nyquist. And as an illustration how people may have erroneous ideas about persons we cite the fact that we were informed that he was addicted to strong drink. Here is a man we were attached to from the first but the information made us a bit wary since we never inbibed. And what a joy it was to learn that information given us was wrong and that he was a total abstainer and a man of clean thoughts.

Here was a man who was to exert a tremendous influence on us and who had the greatest mind of any person that we have ever had the pleasure of becoming acquainted with. He was more than a friend.

Then there is Hjalmar Carlson, who then operated a Meat Market but now Manages the Farmers Union Oil Company. Here is a man that also engaged our attention. It was not long after we made his acquaintance that we realized that his strong will to go forward would soon place him in a position of greater service, and we were pleased when he was chosen as Manager of the Farmers Union Oil Company there. He has meant a great deal to us.

There are others who helped in the pioneering work. If we should publish the names of all too much space would be occupied. But the names of the business firms we mention were the pioneering business firms. From time to time new friends appeared on the scene among the business people until now the Leader gets a good break on all advertising with the exception of the Red Owl Grocery.

But there was much strenuous work and many heartaches during the first few months after the Roosevelt Reporter had been acquired and we began publishing in our own shop. We knew nothing about the mechanics of a newspaper. To master that was far more difficult than the writing, since we had done writing for publication for several years.

It soon became neecssary that the work be done with the aid of the family so as to save on expenses and many nights went by when we worked for more than 36 hours without sleep. Carl and Gilbert being the oldest, were saddled with duties that older persons would have quailed at, while Harold and Avis helped in their way and Mrs. Nelson shared a great deal of the work, and she is still called on to help with the mailing on Thursday mornings.

Many of the persons that have assisted in putting over the Northern Minnesota Leader can look back and see the venture as step by step obstacles were overcome. Finances were never plentiful, but during the early period there were times when the amount of change available was almost nil.

The building of a Farmer-Labor newspaper, with an outstanding editorial policy, and to do it with very limited funds proved hard but interesting. And when a shop was needed last summer, friends again showed their loyalty when they volunteered to erect the building, and the Roseau paper is housed in its own home as a result.

The many acts of friendship have left deep impressions. From a railroad switchtower to the work of publishing of a County Seat Weekly, with limited funds, is a far cry and could not have been accomplished without a great deal of moral and financial aid.

An Interesting Personality

John G. Holmstrom is a very interesting character. We go into detail regarding the personality of some of our close friends so that our readers may know the sort of infleunces we have been under while becoming established as a newspaper publisher.

Here is another man who is a warm personal friend. And right here we might mention that a [illegible], shortly after we came to Roseau, found out that we were not afraid to defend a friend, and as a result made another loyal and considerate friend by the firm loyalty that was displayed. After all if we are to be firm in our convictions it is natural that we seek the companionship of people who are firm in their convictions and not afraid to stand by their guns.

Mr. Holmstrom is firm, yet because of his aggressive spirit he has often been misunderstood. He stands firm on definite principles. But what is his background? How many know that he has written two standard books on blacksmithing, one of which has been sold by Sears Roebuck and Montgomery Ward for the past 25 years. Few people know that royalties amounting to about $25,000 have been filched from him on one of his books through legal skulduggery. His latest book is yet in manuscript form but being a novel and written from the viewpoint of Romance, will undoubtedly prove as popular as Bartelmy's Looking Backward.

From 1910 to 1915 he served as principal blacksmith for the big government dam at Arrow Rock, Idaho. While a resident of Minneapolis for a number of years Floyd B. Olson was the playmate of his son, and many times when the same Floyd B. Olson had become Governor he inquired often about Chesters' father.

A Farmer, a Blacksmith, a Philosopher and an organizer. That is John G. Holmstrom. He is now recuperating from chronic gall bladder trouble and we enjoyed a short but pleasant visit with him Sunday afternoon. Despite his nearly fourscore years his mind is still active and he has a keen interest in public affairs. He is the real father of the Farm Mortgage Moratorium Law.

Another Aggressive Figure

Another person that has been a inestimable help in the founding of the Northern Minnesota Leader and the Marshall County Star is G. T. Nelson, formerly a Pastor in the Mission Covenant Conference, but now a farmer and Civic Leader.

He is known by his friends as G. T. And is he aggressive? He has furnished a great deal of the pep for the Farmer-Labor organization of Roseau County and reached well into Marshall and Kittson Counties. Action and more action is his cry as he pushes forward the cause of a great movement. A deep feeling seems to bind us to this energetic and dynamic little man.

The Marshall County Star

February 20th the Star will have been in existence for one year. It will be the first anniversary. Like the Northern Minnesota Leader there was organized demand for such a venture. For several years leaders of the progressive movement here had conferred with us, from time to time, about coming here.

And the year has been eventful. The experience we gained before coming here has been of inestimable value. Victories that have been achieved could never have been had but for what had been learned from the school of experience.

The primary figures in the move to establish the Marshall County Star was Axel Olson, the Alvarado Butcher, and Ole Elden, the quiet yet firm Oak Park Farmer. Here are two determined men.

But there are others. There is our genial County Auditor, Levi Johnson. Surely the Farmer-Laborites have in him a man of whom they can be proud.

Then there is Heimer and Arnold Dahlin and Alf Elden, Sheriff O. C. Toftner and Nels Hokanson. Senator Rice and Representative Emil Morberg and a host of others have rendered great assistance, while we need not mention those who have been very kind in using the Star through which to advertise. The ads speak for themselves. Most firms have been fair with their advertising.

Arnold Dahlin has sent in the largest number of subscriptions and 40 out of 53 families in Bloomer township have the Star. Then there is Nick Enerson of Bigwoods and Mrs. Sorterberg of Gatzke and Chas. Skoglund of East Valley. There are others also who have sent in subs and we thank all our friends for their kind help.

Sloan relaxed. "My advice is to get out of town for a few days. Get a new perspective on your worries, whatever they are. We see things in proportion after a change of scene." He nodded at him kindly. "I can spare you next week."

He turned it over in his mind as he walked home. Probably Sloan was right and new scenes might be a help, might ease the burden.

The radio was chanting with a plangent sonorousness, "I got those Decatur Street blooo-ooes!" when he came in. Dorrie, near it, a newspaper in her lap, was gazing out the window. She started at his entrance, rose, dropping the paper. "Oh, Hugh," she said in soft surprise.

"Didn't you expect me yet?"

"Of course—five-thirty. But I hadn't realized it was so late." She put her hand absently to her hair, patted it back.

"Hughie, I haven't any dinner ready. I've run out of ideas about food. And see—I burned my hand this morning."

"I'm sorry."

"On the toaster. I touched it when I put it away—had left the current on. It smarted so I had to bandage it. Will you be very nice and take me out to dinner?"

"I have my moments!" He endeavored to speak lightly.

"You're sweet." She smiled into his eyes.

Release flooded his heart, tingled through his veins. "Where shall it be? The club?"

"Most anywhere. They say that tea room near the bridge has a special dinner."

He wanted her to sit down, wanted to tell her about the vacation, but she slid out of his arms with a feline grace. "I'll make myself beautiful," she murmured, starting for the stairs.

As he stood heavily where she left him, her haste to get away closed down on him.

Presently he picked up the paper, sat down by the window. His eye traveled over the headlines—the orders received by the steel mills which would put several hundred more men to work, the dying out of the last epidemic in infantile paralysis, the suicide of a prominent banker, the President's latest speech. On the third page a small item caught his roving eye: Joan Whitney, 120 Mimosa street, vs. Cunningham Whitney, 120 Mimosa street, on the grounds of mental cruelty. They were married April 5, 1924, and have no children.

Ellen, half-hidden in a big chair, clutched the magazine she was reading and braced herself, for her mother had come into the room.

She settled herself in a chair opposite Ellen. "What are you reading?"

"The Modern Arts Magazine."

Lizzie's lips thinned disapprovingly.

"It's harmless, isn't it?" demanded Ellen with sudden spirit.

"I suppose you have to have something to occupy your mind."

It was hard to concentrate with Mother staring at her, and she read it only because she hoped Lizzie would go away if she saw her absorbed.

"How he could treat you that way—the cad! My blood boils when I think about it!"

Ellen threw the magazine down. Some more bloodless surgery was to be attempted—cutting—dissecting—probing! And there was no anesthetic to deaden you to the pain of the knife held by maternal hands. "It's exactly what you wanted," she said in a low voice. "You didn't approve of him."

"I was very nice to him—very!"

"And if he likes Kezia better, he has a right to change his mind. Let's not discuss it any more."

"Ellen, you never give me your confidence," complained Lizzie. "You always keep me at arm's length."

Ellen was silent for a moment, then she leaned forward pleadingly. "Mother, couldn't I . . . please don't say 'no' right away . . . couldn't I take that last year of art school this fall? I know it is October, but I'd only be a few weeks late. I could make it up. They go abroad in December. Please talk it over with Father! . . . I'm very unhappy here . . . please let me go away!"

Lizzie straightened herself regally. "Now we've been all over that before. No daughter of mine can go around studying naked statues in France and Italy with a troop of dissolute students."

"They're not dissolute."

"I don't care how well you are chaperoned, or how famous your instructors are—I won't hear of it. Perhaps some summer you can go with me to Europe. Your father will never leave long enough to take me, so we'll go together! Just be patient."

"But it's not the same. I want the instruction in the class. I want to graduate from Pearson school."

"But why in the world do you want another year? You can't seriously mean to be an artist?"

"Why not"

"An artist?" Lizzie's voice whined like a saxophone off key. "With all your father's money! Such nonsense!"

"It's not nonsense, Mother. It's seeing things further than anyone else sees, expressing things that others feel dimly . . . it's something too tremendous to put into words."

The silver voice ran off Lizzie like rain off water-proof. She reached up and swatted a fly on the curtain. "I'm sure you paint very pretty pictures now," she said flatly.

Ellen knew her cause was lost. She wondered drearily if Lizzie had ever been in love—not liking, not acceptance, but had known this lovely terrifying thing she felt for Jerry. She couldn't have—or she would remember.

CHAPTER X

On Monday morning Hugh departed on a week's hunting trip with Doc Hiller and two of Doc's friends, both of whom Hugh had met on several previous occasions. Hugh sat beside Doc who drove; Rappaport and Akin were in the rear, together with duffle bags, grips and gun-cases, and Rap's English setter, Laddie. Two restless setters were boxed on the trunk rack in the rear. Toward noon they had covered a hundred and fifty miles and were approaching the hunting preserve; Doc became more and more enthusiastic.

"This little burg is Tunketstown. A mile from here we turn off on the roughest road you ever saw—narrow as the gate to heaven, and second gear most of the way! Three miles of that before we come to the lake and you see the lodge."

They were driving through country where rising hills were gayly flying the last banners of autumn. They had the colors of a Paisley shawl, infinite shades of yellow, rose, scarlet, green and mauve.

"It's Exactly What You Wanted," She Said.

"At the next curve you'll see it," said Doc. He had cast aside his professional manner and was a boy out on a lark. Hugh Marsh was unexpectedly with him. He had met Hugh in an elevator a few days ago, said to him: "I'm going on a hunting trip Monday, bird hunting, ruffed grouse. Going up in northern Pennsylvania where our club has twenty-two hundred acres." An impulse had made him speak of it suddenly that way.

Hugh's eyes had kindled. He had laid his hand on his arm. "Take me along, Doc! I'm no hunter, but I need to get away. Couldn't I go as a guest? Pay my share?"

"Go?" He had almost choked. Hugh—go? The darned old idiot! No one he would rather have with him! "Sure you can go!" he had answered. And they had gone into Hugh's office and talked over the equipment he would need.

Doc Hiller had explained about this club to which he had belonged for three years and suggested that Hugh join it. The dues were only fifty dollars; the comfortable lodge house could take care of twenty men; they had dammed the stream and stocked the lake for trout fishing; in November the members went for grouse and quail, and in December for deer and black bear. It was a hunter's paradise. The air was like wine; the fellows were a good sort—no game hogs. They had a colored cook who could cook like nobody's business. Hugh would be so tired he would sleep like a baby, eat well, and forget he ever had a steel plant to worry over!

Hugh had drawn his hand across his eyes with a tired gesture. "Just the thing—just what I want."

Doc shut his teeth grimly. He knew what was eating the old boy. He had guessed it before the hints came.

"Here we are," he sang out.

Floyd Gibbons Adventurers' Club Hello Everybody!

"The White Hell"

By FLOYD GIBBONS
Famous Headline Hunter

YOU know, boys and girls, in most cases adventuring is something that just happens to you all of a sudden. But Wendy MacGowan of Brooklyn, N. Y., went at it deliberately. Wendy was married in India in 1933, and she and her husband started out on the strangest wedding trip you ever heard of—a climb over the great Himalaya mountains, into Little Tibet.

The whole doggone trip was an adventure—but one part of it was even more so. They started out with eleven porters, carrying their kits and tents, rode horseback as far as they could, and then continued afoot into the mountains. At thirteen-thousand feet they ran into snow—and found that the pass they had intended to go through was ice bound.

They had covered most of the distance then, and they didn't want to turn back. They decided, ice or no ice, to push on through the pass. Right there, their porters went on strike. To go on was sheer suicide, they said.

Came to "The End of the World."

But after an hour of argument, Wendy's husband induced his gun bearer, Shaik Khan, and two veteran porters to accompany them. The rest of the porters they sent back to a rest house where they could pick them up on the way back.

"The place we had come to," says Wendy, "was called by the Hindus 'The End of the World.' Before us towered a huge rock wall culminating in twenty-thousand foot crags that shut off the whole horizon. Even the large scale map we carried was virtually blank beyond this point. Few people had ever been there before. Pathfinding was pure guesswork, and we had not even a compass with us, idiots that we were. But we pretended to know all about it to instill courage into our porters. We climbed for three hours up a rocky wall that led us into a ravine. Already our porters were beginning to grumble, but it was too late in the day to turn back. Then one of our porters missed his footing and hurtled down over the rocks. We rescued him, luckily, little hurt, but the experience was too much for our party and we camped for the night."

The next morning they tried again. They climbed for two hours to a spot where a waterfall cascaded down a natural rock staircase. Wendy and her husband elected to climb it, but the porters preferred to avoid it and try a way for themselves. "Dragging ourselves from rock to rock," Wendy says, "we wormed our way up. We were numbed and half dead with the cold when we got to the top. We had completely lost the porters.

They Slid Toward a Great Crevasse.

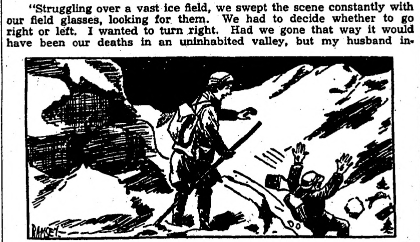
"Struggling over a vast ice field, we swept the scene constantly with our field glasses, looking for them. We had to decide whether to go right or left. I wanted to turn right. Had we gone that way it would have been our deaths in an uninhabited valley, but my husband insisted on going left. Then we were pulled up by realizing that to get to the valley we now sought we must go down a solid wall of ice, more than a hundred-feet high and steeper than a ladder. I won't dwell on that nightmare. We slid, and with eyes shut, gave ourselves up to Providence.



Down He Went, Straight Toward the Jaws of the Crevasse.

"A tiny snow hummock at the foot of the wall, saved us from a yawning crevasse. With shaken nerves we began to cross a shingly slope above a precipice. As my husband stepped on it, his feet slid out from under him, and down he went, straight toward the jaws of the crevasse. To my horror the whole hillside seemed to move with him. He managed to wrest a foothold from an inch-wide bit of rock, and lay there spread-eagle. By sheer luck I managed to reach him with the strap of my field glasses and haul him to safety."

By that time both of them were torn and bleeding. Was there was no escape from this endless, icy hell? Far below them they could see a tiny green valley, but they were cut off from it by a straight wall five-hundred feet high. Snow began to fall—quickly turned into a raging blizzard. The afternoon was wearing on. They sat there in dumb dismay. A night in the open in their light clothes would mean death. If they couldn't find Shaik Khan and the porters they were doomed.

Then, suddenly, they heard a rifle shot. Wendy and her husband started to yell. They focused their field glasses in the direction from which the shot had come and—sure enough—there were three tiny, black dots, a mile away, over on the other side of the glacier.

Wendy took off her jacket and waved it frantically. Whether they saw it or not, they must reach them. Evidently they had found a path to the valley. "We started off at a rush," says Wendy, "but remembering our narrow escapes, we slowed down and climbed high before getting on the glacier again.

"It took us half an hour to cross that mile-wide expanse of ice, for we had to detour around numerous crevasses. But nearer and nearer we came. At last we reached the porters, and there was general rejoicing when the two parties met."

Mystery of the Rifle Shot.

And now comes the part of the story that Wendy says she will never understand. Both she and he husband congratulated Shaik Khan on his astuteness in firing the rifle. He had saved their lives. They told him they wanted to hold a special party for him when they got back on the other side and joined with the rest of the porters. And to their amazement, Shaik Khan became most indignant and swore he had never fired the rifle.

Over there in India, no servant is supposed to fire his master's rifle without permission. It's a strict rule. Without it, the ammunition would dwindle unaccountably. Shaik Khan, good servant that he was, was hurt that anyone should accuse him of doing such a thing. Even the porters swore that they heard no shot, and when Wendy examined the rifle, not a cartridge was missing.

Where did that shot come from? Wendy doesn't know. But I've sort of got a hunch that old Shaik Khan risked his reputation as a servant to save the lives of his master and mistress, and then didn't want to talk about. Those Mohammedans of North India have some strange ideas about honor.

Gas, Gas All the Time, Can't Eat or Sleep

"The gas on my stomach was so bad I could not eat or sleep. Even my heart seemed to hurt. A friend suggested Adlerika. The first dose I took brought me relief. Now I eat as I wish, sleep fine and never felt better."—Mrs. Jas. Filler.

Adlerika acts on BOTH upper and lower bowels while ordinary laxatives act on the lower bowel only. Adlerika gives your system a thorough cleansing, bringing out old, poisonous matter that you would not believe was in your system and that has been causing gas pains, sour stomach, nervousness and headaches for months.

Dr. H. L. Shoub, New York, reports: "In addition to intestinal cleansing, Adlerika greatly reduces bacteria and colon bacilli."

Give your bowels a REAL cleansing with Adlerika and see how good you feel. Just one spoonful relieves GAS and constipation. At all Leading Druggists.

New Way TO SAVE FUEL

NEXT to taking a lease on the garden of Eden, the housewife's dream is a place to live where there would be no regular monthly bills coming in. Food bills one doesn't feel badly about—that was a gorgeous roast Sunday, and that Friday fish was well worth what it cost. Clothing — well, everyone likes new clothes, and you expect to pay for them. But gas bills, light bills, laundry bills — how lucky Eve was, except that she had to go to bed at sundown.

Why not save a bit on your cooking fuel this winter, whether it happens to be gas, electric, coal or oil? Make a list of the canned meats which your family like best and plan to serve them often this winter. Besides the fact that you don't pay for bones which you throw away, you pay for only a minute or two in heating them, and if you have some good recipes on hand, you will be surprised to find what delicious meat dishes you can make.

All Kinds and All Prices

These meats range from the very inexpensive corned beef—solid, tender and delicious—to such good Sunday dinner meats as baked ham or baked chicken in cans. You would boil, or bake, half of a ham for at least two hours, and by the time the skin and bone were removed you would have no more ham than you can buy in the large-size can, ready-cooked, at less cost per pound. Then deduct the two-hours of fuel burning—and what have you? A darn good ham.

Here are some good meat dishes.

Beef and Mushroom Pie: Drain and reserve the liquor from a 4-ounce can of mushrooms. Slice the mushrooms and sauté for five minutes in three tablespoons of butter. Add enough water to the mushroom liquor to make two and one-fourth cups of liquid. Smooth three tablespoons flour to a paste with the liquid, add slowly to the butter and mushrooms and cook until creamy. Add one bouillon cube, one and one-half teaspoons salt, one and one-half cups of small potato balls or cubes and the contents of one 12-ounce can of roast beef which has been cut in cubes. Pour into a baking dish, cover with a crust or with small baking powder biscuits and bake in a hot oven—400 degrees—for thirty-five to forty-five minutes. This serves eight persons.

Creamed Meats

Southern Creamed Chicken and Corn: Slice the mushrooms from a 4-ounce can of mushrooms from which the liquor has been drained and reserved. Cook mushrooms with one-half cup chopped blanched almonds in three tablespoons butter for five minutes, being careful not to brown. Add three tablespoons flour and stir until smooth. Add slowly the mushroom liquor and two cups milk, stirring constantly until smooth and creamy. Add salt and pepper to taste, one cup canned corn, one 6-ounce can of chicken which has been cut up, and one slightly-beaten egg yolk. Have mixture very hot. This serves eight persons.

French Omelet with Creamed Ham Loaf: Melt two tablespoons butter, add two tablespoons flour and stir until smooth. Add one and one-third cups milk slowly, stirring constantly until smooth and creamy. Season with salt and pepper to taste and add two teaspoons lemon juice. Cut the contents of a 7-ounce can of ham loaf in small dice and add with one-half cup diced celery and one-fourth cup sliced stuffed olives. Reheat and serve around a rolled French omelet made in the usual way. This serves four persons.

Crookston Winter Show

The 57th annual Northwest School Farmers' Week and Red River Valley Winter shows will open next Monday with over forty prominent speakers and judges in charge of the varied educational program.

D. M. Ladd, G-man in charge of Chicago office of the Federal Bureau of investigation, will speak on "The FBI's War on Crime" Tuesday evening Feb. 9. Mr. Ladd was born in North Dakota, graduated from George Washington University Law School, and is a member of the Dictrict of Columbia bar. He has been with the Federal Bureau of Investigation since 1928 and has been special agent in charge of the New Orleans, St. Louis, St. Paul and Chicago field divisions of the Bureau. He has worked on such cases as the kidnaping of Ausust Luer, "Machine Gun Kelly", the kidnaping of Edward G. Bremer and the Dillinger case. The work of the G-men has been hailed as the outstanding achievement of the past decade. This organization has furnished ample proof that crime does not pay.

Gerald P. Nye, Washington, D. C., will deliver the address of the day on Wednesday evening. He will speak on "War Versus Agriculture."

Dr. and Mrs. Jean F. Piccard will join in presenting an illustrated lecture on "The Exploration of the Stratosphere" on Thursday evening, Feb. 11.

Slides and motion pictures will be used in the explanation of the now famous stratosphere flight from Detroit, Mich. in 1934, for the study of cosmic rays.

Activities will close Friday evening with the sixteenth angual song festival by the Northwestern Minnesota Singers' Association. The veteran, T. W. Thorson, will direct the one-hundred fifty male-voice chorus from ten different communities.

Council Rented Properties

The Village Council, at a meeting held last Friday evening, rented out the properties here which had gone to the state on tax delinquent certificates the past year. This caused a little hard feeling among some of the renters as they felt that they should continue to live in such properties and pay rent whenever they deemed it necessary and not when some authority or responsible party deemed it so.

It seems that the time has come when all people must pay a just and fair rent regardless of who the owner or landlord is, so let it rest at that.

Have you given anything to the Red Cross? The Ohio flood sufferers need your help.

Signed Seed Loan Bill

President Roosevelt signed a $50,000,000 seed and crop production loan bill last Friday, a measure congressional sponsors said would keep thousands of farmers off relief rolls.

It provided for loans up to $400, at 4% interest, to farmers unable to obtain credit elsewhere for purchase of seed and feed this season. In drought and other emergency areas, the president may raise the maximum loan limit.

The farm credit administration will supervise the loans. Borrowers will be required to give liens on crops and first mortgages on stock.

The president vetoed a similiar bill last congress, explaining the expenditure was not provided for in the budget. Later, however, he set aside emergency relief funds for seed loans.

Another administration farm bill was introduced by Rep. Jones(D Tex). It would continue until January 1, 1941, the payment of benefits to farmers complying with the soil conservation act.

Asked For Weed Eradication

Rep. D. Worth Clark of Pocatello, Idaho, asked congrses Friday to authorize the agricultural department to conduct a nationwide program to control and eradicate noxious weeds on farm lands.

The federal government, under Clark's bill would start the program by setting aside $50,000,000 for matching with state funds on a basis of $3 in federal money to $1 put up by states. The initial appropriation of $50,000,000 would be for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1938.

No state could share in the program unless it agreed to provide at least 25 percent of the cost and devised an eradication program to meet requirements of the agricultural department.

Safetygrams BY FRED W. BRAUN © The Safety Man

What is carbon monoxide gas? Carbon monoxide gas may be formed by burning almost any kind of fuel without enough oxygen. A very small percentage of carbon monoxide gas in the air will cause headache, the unconciousness, then death. The blood has a great affinity for carbon monoxide and absorbs it from the lungs instead of the oxygen which is needed to sustain life.

An automobile engine running in an ordinary small garage with doors and windows closed will produce enough carbon monoxide gas to kill you in a few minutes.

Carbon monoxide gas is odorless, colorless, and very deadly. You cannot feel it, see it, smell it, or taste.

Never run the motor of your car unless the garage doors and windows are wide open.

INFLUENCED to a great extent by thousands of letters from fans, Norma Shearer has definitely decided to make more pictures. From New York, where she went to visit Helen Hayes, she telephoned the studio that she would come back soon ready to begin preparatory work on "Marie Antoinette." She chose this story in preference to any other, because she had discussed every detail of its production with her husband before his death. Actual date of production depends on Charles Laughton, because she is determined to have him in the cast and he is under contract to make several pictures in England. It is good to know that we will be seeing Norma on the screen again.

The most encouraging and sympathetic audience any girl ever had while making a film test was Alice Marble's when she tried out recently. Carole Lombard was right there on the sidelines making suggestions and cheering. Some people might think that Alice Marble won enough glory in tennis tournaments for one young girl, but Carole thinks it would be nicer for her to get in the big earnings that come with glory in pictures.

Radio favorites are moving en masse to Hollywood. Harriet Hilliard is back at R. K. O. Milton Berle will be there soon, and very costly it will be for him too because he will have to pay all the expenses of bringing his radio troupe west. And soon Fred Allen will move his broadcasting activities to Hollywood, so that he can make another picture for Twentieth Century-Fox. He will be in "Sally, Irene and Mary," a new version of an old picture which launched Constance Bennett and Joan Crawford on their screen careers.

Those august personages at National Broadcasting company's artists' service have put a new artist under contract and they are fairly swamped with mail asking about her. She is Minnie, the singing mouse, who appeared on the National Barn Dance program, and who will probably be star of a program of her own soon. Minnie was trained by W. W. Lichty, a veterinary of Woodstock, Ill., who noticed that when he was playing the piano, one of the mice he raises for experimental purposes tried to follow the tune.

Paramount is going to defy the fates and attempt to make a picture that has long been a jinx in their studio. They started it last year with Marlene Dietrich, and when it was about half-finished, she walked out and declared that she would have none of it. So, Paramount engaged Margaret Sullavan to replace her, and then little Sullavan tripped over a cable and fractured her arm. Paramount still likes the story, once called "Hotel Imperial" and then "I Loved a Soldier" and also they like very much a young Viennese actress named Franciszka Gaal, so they are going to attempt to make it with her.

George Cukor, who will direct "Gone With the Wind," is determined to cast some girl who is not very well known in pictures in the lead. One faction at the studio wants Tallulah Bankhead whose tests have shown her to be a brilliant actress, but too old for the early part of the story. Others want Margaret Sullavan. But by far the most promising candidate is a very young and vivid actress on the New York stage named Louise Platt.

ODDS and ENDS—The M-G-M studio is busily pairing off their stars, but just professionally, trying to achieve a combination as sure at the box-office as Gary Cooper and Jean Arthur have proved to be. They are going to try Jean Harlow with Robert Taylor, Joan Crawford with William Powell . . . Both Warner Brothers and Paramount are trying to get Noel Coward and Gertrude Lawrence to do their nine short plays, that are Broadway's biggest hits, as screen shorts. But a radio sponsor is topping their every bid. . . . Portland Hoffa always maneuvers an invitation to spend Sunday away from home, because that is the day her husband, Fred Allen, writes his radio script and he doesn't like to be disturbed.

Si Blewey, the caretaker, a tall weather-beaten native of the hills, met them at the door. Just behind him was Jim, the colored chef, smiling.

The hall was filled with trophies of moose and deer. Gun racks occupied one side. To the left was a living-room thirty feet long and about eighteen wide, with a gray stone fireplace, blackened at the lintel, a fire of beech logs blazing in it.

Doc showed it to Hugh with pride. "Here's where we spend our evenings. Tonight they'll sit up late, perhaps a poker game or talking guns and dogs, but tomorrow night, the first day of the season, one by one they disappear up the stairs. Can't stay awake."

Hugh and Doc occupied one of the seven bedrooms. The "bull-pen," a long room with its eight cots, was left for the late arrivals. They had lunch in the big dining-room with its rectangular table, made of planks with birch log supports, then set out with Si Blewey and two or three members of the club from Tryon City to reconnoitre.

They tramped up to Wolf's Hollow, to the cherry grove, and in the old orchard they found fresh bear tracks. The bears had been feeding from the old apple trees, had clawed out the honey from a stump.

After dinner Doc showed him how to oil his gun, and discussed the value of 12, 16, and 20 gauge shotguns. Hugh refused to enter a bridge game, but sat behind Rap at the poker table for an hour. Then such a weariness came over him that he went up to his bedroom.

As he undressed he vaguely wondered what Dorrie was doing. She was staying with his mother while he was gone. She didn't want to take a vacation now. The only place she cared to go was Atlantic City, and she would rather go there at Easter. Strangely enough, she seemed removed, outside the periphery of his emotions, for the first time. He felt almost no interest in what she might be doing!

At six o'clock the next morning there was a banging on his door and Jim's voice announcing: "Breakfast, Dr. Hiller, Mr. Marsh." He went on down the corridor knocking at each door.

Hugh was half dressed when Doc raised himself on his arm, grinned sociably, said, "Hello! How'd you sleep?"

"Exactly like the infant you said I would. And I feel horribly hungry. Is that ham we smell frying?"

Doc rolled out. "Home cured ham."

They could hear voices downstairs and in the yard, the yapping of the dogs as food was brought to them. The darkness outside was rifted with gray and the air from the open window, damply chill. Later when they had breakfasted and set out in twos and threes for the different locations, the sun broke through. Hugh, wearing his new hunting coat and red cap, carrying his new gun, went with Doc.

"You're liable to get a bird before I do—beginner's luck. I never knew it to fail. I hope you do. It will make you enthusiastic—a real hunter."

Hugh drew on his pipe. "Thanks, Doc. Birds or no birds, this is good enough for me." He indicated the woods, quiescent and gleaming in the sun. Something in him balked at shooting anything living and free; but he couldn't tell Doc that.

"When Tobey flushes a bird, you fire first. I'll have the second shot if you miss. We're going to the grapevines. They'll be feeding there today."

"How far is it?"

"Another mile, I think. Hard to tell on this uneven ground."

Suddenly Tobey stood still, his tail a rigid line. There was movement in the underbrush to the left, a sudden whirring as two ruffed grouse rose in flight. After a second or two, Doc's gun spoke, but he missed them.

"You didn't shoot." He looked at Hugh reproachfully. "I waited for you—why didn't you?"

Hugh gave a deprecatory laugh. "I told you I was a poor one to go hunting with! I didn't know what it was all about, until you fired."

Doc gave him a push. Still sleepy? Never mind. We'll probably see others. What's a bird or two compared to . . . say, you know I don't give a darn whether we get any."

"Liable not to—you will be handicapped from the start."

"I was going to say 'compared to having you along,'" said Doc, not looking at Hugh as he moved ahead.

Hugh's eyes dwelt on Doc's broad back. Something sturdy and dependable about that back.

"Got a match?"

Doc paused and pulled out his lighter.

Hugh kept his eyes down as he held the flame to his pipe. "Get this straight, old man—I'm not much for saying things, as you know—but your taking me on this trip means a lot to me. Think of the finest life-saving job you ever accomplished in that hospital of yours—tumor on the brain, blood transfusion—what are some of the things you do to keep people alive?"

"Amputation."

"Amputation . . ." Hugh's hazel eyes held a sudden glint. "Whatever you do there," he said slowly, "you're doing now for me—d'you understand?"

Doc nodded. "Sure, I do." As he walked on he whistled a few bars of "Pack up your troubles" half under his breath.

That afternoon when they came in footsore and weary, they had two birds, both of which Doc had shot. After dinner Hugh wandered outside away from the smoke-filled, noisy living-room.

He saw a small animal swimming —perhaps a beaver. The lake was black, shot with a few reflectons of light from the windows of the lodge; the opposite shore was shrouded in darkness. "Amputation." The word repeated itself, clung to him.

He raised his eyes. The faint radiance of early evening was in the sky. A single star, very brilliant, very large, hung above the top of a pine. It seemed to be challenging his attention. Bright star . . .

He gazed at it a long time. Its steady shining seemed to bear a message, one that his groping inner ear translated. He felt as if he had been lost in the labyrinth of an underground cavern, fumbling this way and that—falling—hopeless. Far off he saw the light of an opening which promised to bring him upward to the sunlight once more—to peace.

It was Friday night when Hugh came home. Doc stopped his car before the Marsh home; Hugh unloaded his bags, carried them up the walk. His mother met him at the door. "We didn't expect you so soon. Dorrie has gone over to the Lawrences."

"The Lawrences?" He took off his chamois jacket. "Who are they?"

Fluvanna looked startled. "Friends of yours, Dorrie said."

"Oh, yes," he gulped, remembering. He turned as Kezia came out of the living-room. "Hello, Kezia."

"Hello, Nimrod! Any luck?" She kissed him twice with warmth.

He was pleased. "You haven't done that since you came from school."

"You haven't been away before and I'm glad to see you, Hughie. Bring anything for the family larder?"

"Three grouse and a couple of quail—but don't ask who shot them."

Jerry Purdue sauntered out of the living-room. "Good-evening, Mr. Marsh. Have a nice trip?"

"Yes, thanks." Hugh looked at him with surprise. Was Jerry now calling on Kezia? "If you'll excuse me I'll go wash up a bit."

He joined his mother in the library at the end of the hall a few minutes later, a pleasant room with a fireplace, and open bookshelves lining the walls. She had been reading something and the book lay on her lap.

"How long has this been going on?" He motioned toward the living-room.

"Quite a while."

"Do you approve of it?"

"No . . . I gave my consent because she was meeting him secretly."

"There's Ellen . . ."

"I know." Pain was alive for a moment in his mother's eyes.

"What will be the outcome?"

"She will tire of him—or she will marry him. She says she wants to marry him, now."

Hugh lighted his pipe. "They'll be damnably unhappy, I predict." He pulled on his pipe savagely. "Jerry smashing up Ellen—and Kezzie wanting him to satisfy her vanity."

"I know those things, Hugh. And yet——"

"What?"

"I think that Kezia will get along with him better than Ellen. They have a common meeting ground—their selfishness makes them understand each other. Ellen has depth and loyalty; she is suffering now, but not so much as she might have done later."

"But, Mother, he won't make Kezia happy."

She turned her eyes on Hugh with a patient, infinitely gentle gaze. "I'm afraid not. And of course I want her to be happy."

There was silence between them for a moment then Fluvanna went on, "Hugh, that has been my goal in life—to have you children happy. But I am beginning to see—beginning to see"—her voice faltered —"that no parent can guarantee happiness to her children."

They both sat still and Hugh had a knocking prescience that she knew . . . knew about Dorrie. "No parent can guarantee happiness," she had said, and had looked at him with compassion. Did she know? If she did, he felt sorrow that she would have his burden to bear—and a tremendous relief.

"Mother——" he said. Then stopped, gazed at her.

"Hugh——"

She opened her arms and he bent to her, put his head on her breast with aching yearning, felt her tenderness flood and envelop him.

Going to the Party?

WHERE is the party? At Mrs. Smith's on Walnut street and it looks awfully much as though the principals were caught by the candid camera. Luckily, however, they're perfectly groomed for their parts:

Introducing Janet.

Janet in her jumper (Pattern 1996) is asking Mother which glassware to use. Her plaid blouse in taffeta makes her feel very dressed up. Mother chose this style because the many possibilities for change make it a wardrobe rather than a dress and she knew it would be easy-to-make. Your own little girl may have this same ensemble in sizes 6, 8, 10, 12, and 14 years. Size 8 requires 1¾ yards of 39 inch material for the jumper and 1⅛ yards for the blouse.

Mother, the Hostess.

Mother is the perfect hostess, calm and assured, because she knows her all-occasion frock with its sprightly crisp apron (Pattern 1220) is becoming and appropriate. For house wear she made up this model in print. She is wearing here the crepe version and knows that it will be delightful for later on in cool black and white. It comes in sizes 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44, and 46. The dress and apron in size 36 require 5½ yards of 39 inch material. The apron alone requires 1⅛ yards.

And the Guest.

The guest just arriving is wearing her trigest Sew-Your-Own. She likes it because the puffed shoulders and swing skirt make her hips look smaller. The collar is young and the sleeves stylish. This frock is especially chic in silk crepe alpaca or one of the lovely new prints. For your own daytime distinction, then, why not make up Pattern 1205? It is available in sizes 14, 16, 18, and 20 (32 to 42 bust). Size 16 requires 4⅝ yards of 39 inch material. One ball of yarn required for trimming as pictured.

Between two evils one may have to choose neither.

Why Laxatives Fail In Stubborn Constipation
Twelve to 24 hours is too long to wait when relief from clogged bowels and constipation is needed, for then enormous quantities of bacteria accumulate, causing GAS, indigestion and many restless, sleepless nights.
If you want REAL, QUICK RELIEF, take a liquid compound such as Adlerika. Adlerika contains SEVEN cathartic and carminative ingredients that act on the stomach and BOTH bowels. Most "overnight" laxatives contain one ingredient that acts on the lower bowel only.
Adlerika's DOUBLE ACTION gives your system a thorough cleansing, bringing out old poisonous waste matter that may have caused GAS pains, sour stomach, headaches and sleepless nights for months.
Adlerika relieves stomach GAS at once and usually removes bowel congestion in less than two hours. No waiting for "overnight" results. This famous treatment has been recommended by many doctors and druggists for 35 years. Take Adlerika one-half hour before breakfast or one hour before bedtime and in a short while you will feel marvelously refreshed. At all Leading Druggists.

Why is "human nature" always interpreted as bad human nature?

If You Have a Child
ASK YOUR DOCTOR THIS

Ask Him Before Giving Your Child an Unknown Remedy
Practically any doctor you ask will warn: "Don't give your child unknown remedies without asking your doctor first."
When it comes to the widely used children's remedy — "milk of magnesia," the standard of the world is established. For over half a century many doctors have said "PHILLIPS' Milk of Magnesia." Safe for children. No other is "quite like it."
Keep this in mind, and say "PHILLIPS' MILK OF MAGNESIA" when you buy. Now also in tablet form. Get the form you prefer. But see that what you get is labeled "Genuine Phillips' Milk of Magnesia."
ALSO IN TABLET FORM:
Each tiny tablet is the equivalent of a teaspoonful of genuine Phillips' Milk of Magnesia.

Early Hardships

The Kansas pioneers lived hard lives. They had no fountain pens to leak on their fingers. No telephones to ring while they were taking baths. No motor cars to get flat tires or run out of gasoline. It took real men to stand up under such hardships.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

DISCOVERED Way to Relieve Coughs QUICKLY
IT'S BY relieving both the irritated tissues of the throat and bronchial tubes. One set of ingredients in FOLEY'S HONEY & TAR quickly relieves tickling, hacking, coughing . . . coats and soothes irritated throat linings to keep you from coughing. Another set actually enters the blood, reaches the affected bronchial tubes, loosens phlegm, helps break up cough and speeds recovery. Check a cough due to a cold before it gets worse, before others catch it. Check it with FOLEY'S HONEY & TAR. It gives quick relief and speeded-up recovery.

How to Ease a Cold Quickly

1. Take 2 BAYER ASPIRIN tablets and drink a full glass of water. Repeat treatment in 2 hours.
2 If throat is sore, crush and stir 3 BAYER ASPIRIN tablets in ⅓ glass of water. Gargle twice. This eases throat rawness and soreness almost instantly.
Get Quick-Acting, Quick-Dissolving Bayer Aspirin. Take 2 Tablets
The modern way to ease a cold is this: Two Bayer Aspirin tablets the moment you feel a cold coming on. Then repeat, if necessary, according to instructions in the box.
At the same time, if you have a sore throat, crush and dissolve three BAYER tablets in one-third glass of water. And gargle with this mixture twice.
The Bayer Aspirin you take internally will act to combat the fever and pains which usually accompany colds. The gargle will provide almost instant relief from rawness and pain, acting like a local anesthetic on the irritated membrane of your throat.
Try this way. Your doctor, we know, will endorse it. For it is a quick, effective means of combating a cold. Ask for Bayer Aspirin by the full name at your druggist's — not for "aspirin" alone.

All…
I Owe to My Angel Mother

A LITTLE girl, reared in poverty in the backwoods of Virginia, destined for a brief and none too happy life, was to grow up and bear a child whose career more than fulfilled her highest dreams for him.

Born at Patterson's Creek, Va., in 1784, Nancy Hanks went at the age of twelve to live with her aunt and uncle, Thomas and Elizabeth Sparrow, in Mercer county, Virginia. She had a chance to attend school there, and made the most of it. In a community where many of the men could neither read nor write, she learned to do both, notes a writer in the Indianapolis News.

She was skilled at needlework, too, and hired out to families in the neighborhood. Though she worked for wages she was never regarded as a servant, but sat at table with the household wherever she went. Report says she was tall and handsome, with a frank, open countenance and a voice pleasing both when she sang and when she talked.

A young apprentice named Thomas Lincoln was learning the trade of carpentry in the shop of Joseph Hanks, uncle of Nancy. The two young people were attracted to each other, and were married on June 12, 1806. Thomas took his bride home to a tiny house fourteen feet square.

He could not write his own name until the ambitious Nancy taught him how. But his ambition could not keep pace with hers. Her disappointment at his easy-going ways was forgotten in her children; first, a little girl, Sarah; then, in 1809, the son known to history as Abraham Lincoln.

Nancy Hanks, Mother of President Abraham Lincoln.

Between this child and this backwoods mother there was a powerful bond of sympathy. They understood each other without words. Perhaps she felt in him her own fierce hunger for learning, for a larger, richer world.

She was thirty-four years old, and Abraham Lincoln was nine, when she fell ill of an epidemic disease known in southern Indiana (to which the family had migrated) as the milk sickness. In seven days she was dead.

Abraham helped his father to make her coffin out of green lumber cut with a whipsaw, helped to bury her in a forest clearing. There was no ceremony. This troubled the boy until several months later, they secured a wandering preacher to deliver a funeral sermon over the lonely grave.

His mother's influence stayed with him always, and was voiced in that most famous of filial epitaphs: "All that I am or hope to be, I owe to my angel mother."

WPA Wants Information

Residents of Marshall county who posses articles that represent unusual decorative art in this area, earlier then 1880, last week were invited to report them to the WPA federal art project in St. Paul. This work, known officially as the Minnesota branch of Index of American Design is making a permanent record of such old-time art.

The index, according to Miss Beatrice Mertons, Detroit Lakes, district supervisor of WPA women's and professional projects, already had traced and recorded a large number of interesting items, a notable one being a lawn seat, of cast iron and complicated design, the owner of which had all but forgotten its history and did not realize its historic value. The index will will consist of a series of drawings, in black and white, or color or photographs of the main types of American decorative art and significant variations from type.

"We are not limiting ourselves to the material in museums and semi-public collections, "Miss Jeanne Taylor, projects supervisor, wrote Miss Mertens. "Such material always will be accessible," she pointed out.

"What we want to locate and preserve in renderings or photographs are articles in private hands, particularly those that never have reached the collector-family heirlooms of furniture, household objects, costumes, wood or stone carving, pottery, textiles and floor coverings, hooked rugs and similiar articles.

"We hope that residents of this county owning such articles will take this opportunity to have them recorded permanently," Miss Mertens said.

Persons wanting more information about the index should write to Miss Jeanne Taylor at 529 Portland Avenue, St. Paul.

1937 Short Course Program

While not complete in all details, the program for the 1937 short course, to be held at Warren, Feb. 19th and 20th, promises to be one of much merit. A very interesting program has been arranged for these two days.

On the evening of Feb. 19, J. O. Christianson, principal of the School of Agriculture, University of Minnesota, will have as his topic 'Learning to live together.' Mr. Christianson is one of the outstanding speakers in the state at the present time, and will deliver a lecture which should be heard by every one. The Warren High School Band will give a half hour concert, under the direction of K. K. Kiland.

On Saturday evening, Feb. 20, the Stephen High School Band, under the direction of Mr. Huselid, will open the program with music and will be followed by Dr. A. A. Dowell, and the faculty of the N. W. School of Agriculture, who will furnish the balance of the program. Dr. Dowell will speak on "Present trends in agriculture." His speech will bring to the attention of those who hear him many interesting facts on factors affecting th position of the American farmer on the World Market. Members of the faculty of the N. W. School of Agriculture will give readings, vocal and instrumental numbers, which will be worth while. Besides this, local farmers clubs will put on one act plays and stunts of some sort.

Marshall County Seed Show

After having been discontinued for several years, a seed show will be held in connection with the Short Course this year. The federated Farmers Clubs have set aside the sum of $60.00 to be used as prize money for the best exhibits of grains, corn, grasses and potatoes. The show is open to all farmers in the Northwest, with the idea that stocks of seed may be located for use in 1937.

It is hoped that every farmer having seed for sale will send in a sample for this show, stating the number of bushels he may have for sale purposes. All enteries should be made with W. O. Berg, Warren, Minn. or the County Agents Office. Exhibits must be in before noon, Feb. 19, and should consist of half a bushel of grain or potatoes, four quarts of grass seed, and ten ears of corn.

Mr. and Mrs. Iver Larson and sons were entertained at the H. O. Hanson home Sunday evening

A. L. Carlson is spending this week in the Twin Cities and Chicago markets buying stock for the five Carlson's stores.

The Martyred Lincoln

ABRAHAM LINCOLN

Knutson's Liked Oregon

Upon his return home from the west coast where he with his family spent the past two months, J. H. Knutson made a visit to the News office and told us about how he liked the country out there.

The Knutson family had to follow the snow plow thru the Red Woods of Northern California in order to get thru and we can well picture what that must have been in comparison to the time we were there in the summer of 1934 when the heat wave was on both there and here.

Mr. Knutson stated that he liked the west quite well. Especially the country around Silverton, Oregon where the Oakey and Tollefsrud families have taken up homes. He also stated that Washington was not so bad but that he like, many others, had very little use for California. This proves that only California people themselves do all the high-wide-and-handsome advertising that you hear and read about the state, which to our estimation and, many others, is made either for the idle rich or the real poor. Its a poor place for the middle class.

Mr. Knutson and family are glad to be back to our community and we are glad to have them back. We hope they will find a suitable place near Holt to take the place of their fine farm in the Mud Lake area which they sold last fall to the State of Minnesota for a game refuge.

Call Bids On Mud Lake Project

The United States bureau of biological survey have published in the Improvement Bulletin in Minneapolis a call for bids for 600,000 cubic yards of escavation and embankment work in connection with the Mud Lake wild life refuge project east of Holt. The official call states that bids will be opened Feb. 19, and completion of the work during the coming season is contemplated.

Scout Troop Took Hike

The local Boy Scout troop No. 112, under the leadership of Hartley Peterson, their able scoutmaster, went on a hike on Saturday into the tall timber.

The whole troop was mounted on skiis, each one carrying a knap sack on his back in which he had eats to take a cooking test. Tracking, and other tests were also taken by some of the members of the troop.

The local troop under the leadership of Mr. Peterson has made splendid progress the past year and according to reports from other communities who have troops, they are a little ahead when it comes to being up and coming. The parents of the boys who belong to this great organization have reason to be proud of the son who can accomplish something when he goes out to do so.

This week is National Boy Scout Week and the boys are wearing their Neckerchiefs to school and next Sunday they will all maroh to the Nazareth Lutheran church in body to attend services. The Boy Scouts also expect to see their parents attend these services.

The boys have been busy the past week getting measured up for new uniforms and it will do the people of this community good to come to church next Sunday to see the local troop march in wearing their new uniforms.

Killer Given Life Term

Alton Oveson of Roseau was convicted in district court there on Thursday of last week of first degree murder in connection with the death December 6 of his brother-in law, E. A. Harloff, mayor of Warroad. He was sentenced by Judge M. A. Brattland to life imprisonment at hard labor.

Oveson's trial opened Monday, Feb. 1 after a grand jury charged him with the killing. Three witnesses testified Oveson admitted the shooting.

Harloff was shot at his home after he returned from a church service. Oveson was arrested when he was reported to have boasted in a beer parlor that he had shot a man. Oveson was said to have been at outs with Harloff who had been assisting members of the Oveson family when Oveson was unable to support them.

Mr. Harloff, who also had a large family, had been station agent for the Great Northern at Warroad for many years. Oveson and Harloff were married to sisters. Oveson was the kind who never could make good.

Simplicity That Intrigues

THIS is the problem: Sister wants to entertain the Girl Scouts, it's Jule's turn to have the Bid-or-Bi club and Rose insists she can't put off the Laff-a-Lots a minute longer. And each of them has just finished a new dress and is anxious to wear it for the occasion.

Sister's Choice.

Sister's bit of intrigue is, as you can see, a dress worth wanting to show off (Pattern 1223). It is made of velveteen this time and a little later on she's going to blossom out in a bright crisp gingham version for school. The smart collar, flattering flared skirt and puff sleeves are good reasons for this frock's popularity. It comes in sizes 6 to 14 years. Size 8 requires 2⅛ yards of 39 inch material.

Jule's Entertaining Dress.

Jule knows a neat trick when she sees one whether on the table or in a page of fashions, and she didn't miscue in choosing Pattern 1998. She'll wear this snappy shirt frock when she's "it" to entertain and because she chose broadcloth it will look more trig and lovely after each washing. The diagram shows why a few hours is all that's needed to sew this grand number. You may have it in sizes 34 to 46. Size 36 requires 4⅔ yards of 35 inch material. With long sleeves 4⅞ yards.

It Was Easy, Says Rose.

They didn't believe Rose when she said she made this startlingly pretty dress (Pattern 1224). She did though, even the buttonholes! However, the same stunning effect can be had by sewing the buttons on for trimming only. The elegance of the princess-like lines, the eclat of the heart shaped sleeves and withal its ease of construction make the question read "How can I help but make this dress?" It is available in sizes 12 to 20 (30 to 40 bust). Size 14 requires 4⅜ yards of 39 inch material, plus ⅝ yard contrasting. With long sleeves 4⅞ yards required.

Golden Gate Salad.

½ pound of fresh marshmallows cut in halves.
2 nice oranges, carefully peeled and cut in small pieces.
2 bananas, cut in dicelike pieces.
2 thick slices of fresh pineapple cut in the same way.
1 large tart apple, cut fine.
½ pint bottle of red maraschino cherries, cut in half, with juice.
½ pint jar of french marrons, broken up, with sirup.
The delicate inner stalks of one head of celery, cut in small pieces.
¼ pound of fresh pecans or english walnuts.

Mix nuts, fruits, celery together in dish and put in icebox.

Dressing.

½ pint of thick mayonnaise.
½ pint of thick cream.

Whip cream and mix with mayonnaise and juice of half a lemon. An hour before serving mix dressing lightly with salad and sprinkle with plenty of paprika. Serve very cold on crisp lettuce leaves.

I like this salad very much. I ate it first in California, so I call it Golden Gate salad. It is best made of fresh fruits, but it can be made of canned fruits. At home we often serve it instead of dessert, with a little more whipped cream.

When the craft is in the air and flying at full speed, the booster plane cuts off and the big ship continues, carrying a load which alone it could not lift off the ground.—Washington Star.

"Oh, Mother," he sighed. His eyes were tearless, but the aching pain was released. Her arms folded around him; her cheek lay against his hair; they were close in that mystic bond of mother and son.

"It's hard, Hugh."

"I'm glad you know." He groped to his feet, stood by the mantel. "Don't grieve too much. I have to get myself together—meet it. It has happened to quite a few others . . . they've lived through it."

"It isn't hopeless? Tell me about it, for while I saw you getting haggard and silent, it wasn't until Dorrie came this week that I realized——"

"Did she speak of it?"

She shook her head. "I only knew something is very wrong. I met Lizzie Pendleton this week in a department store. She said, 'Too bad about Hugh and Dorrie.' I asked her what she meant, and she gave me an odd look, and said she supposed I knew—and swept away. I pieced it together."

He began to pace the room. Then he told her the story, or as little as he could, minimizing, suppressing, scanting details. "I suppose you have to know—I hoped you wouldn't. But situations like this never stand still. To go back to where we were"—he shook his head—"is impossible. Something is killed—destroyed."

His mother's eyes were filled with tears; she looked suddenly old and white, her vitality borne away by her deep suffering for him.

The telephone rang in the closet under the stairs and they heard Kezia scramble to answer it. Her oment by, "You won't be home? . . . Yes, cars have a way of getting out of commission at times! . . . I'll tell your husband not to expect you . . . . Here? Of course he's here—got in an hour ago."

She appeared at the library door then. "Hugh, the telephone." She lingered a moment, caught by the gravity of their faces. "It's Dorrie," she whispered.

Hugh took up the receiver. "Hello, Hugh," she began with hesitation. "I didn't think you'd be home until tomorrow.

"You didn't?"

"No, I didn't," her voice strengthened and had a whip of defiance in it. "Anyhow I'm at the Lawrences, and they find they have a flat tire, wanted me to stay all night . . . But if you're home I'll send for a taxicab."

"Shall I come for you?"

"No need of it. It's way across town. I'll be along in half an hour."

"Very well," said Hugh grimly, "but don't come here. Go to our own house."

He began to gather up his things. "I'll take your car, Mother, if you don't mind."

Kezia hovered over him in excited solicitude. "I'll drive you over, Hughie. Come, Jerry, help me get the car out." She paid no attention to his protestations that he drive himself, but hurried away with Jerry following.

Soon Kezia sounded a summoning horn from the driveway. Hugh put down his burdens in a corner of the hall. "I'm going . . . but I'll be back in a little while. I'm only going to talk to her."

He strode out the door. He waved to Kezia in dismissal. "Thanks—but I want to walk."

CHAPTER XI

The walks were littered with leaves that scuffed under Hugh's feet. His shadow lengthened as he passed under one arc light, shortened as he approached the light at the next corner. He walked slowly, took the long way round, that he might give Dorrie time to get home; for Cun to get away; time for her to rehearse her story for the last time. And he must be cool, as he was now, viewing the whole thing with balance.

The turmoil which had mounted in him the last hour, and which had increased when he heard Dorrie's voice on the wire, ebbed away.

Dorrie had taken off her hat and coat. They were thrown on the davenport. A plaid scarf with russet tinges was still around her neck. "Hello, Hugh," she said briefly.

"Hello, Dorrie."

She leaned over and tied the lace of her shoe. "Have a nice trip?" she inquired as she raised her head.

In spite of himself the sight of her flushed cheeks, her strange shining eyes, sent a tremor through his blood. He rested his arm on the mantel. "I had a profitable one."

She cogitated this. "Meaning——?"

"What I said."

"Very well—if you wish to be enigmatic!" Cruel pin-points danced in her eyes. "Are you going to ask me if I had a profitable time while you were away?"

"I took it for granted."

She shrugged. Then said: "The house is cold; you'd better build a fire if we're going to stay here."

Under his steady gaze her eyes dropped.

"I must have a talk with you," he said slowly.

They went into the sun room with its wicker furniture. Formally Hugh drew up a chair for her, brought her coat and laid it around her shoulders. He touched a match to the asbestos-backed grate, adjusted the flame. Then stood in silence. Dorrie looked into the fire; her white hands were clasped around her knee. She lifted her creamy eyelids. "Going to tell me you're through?" she asked.

"Yes, Dorrie, I'm through."

He thought she trembled a little, and the discernment that she was in need of pity, even as he, battled with his resolution. He stood watching her eyelashes flicker over her cheeks as she looked down.

"Hugh, you'll make it easy for me?"

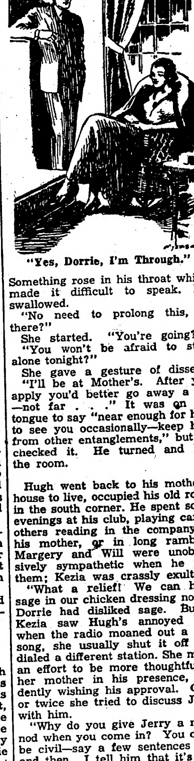
"Certainly."

She relaxed in her chair a trifle. "It's one of those things which can't be helped. At first I was disappointed in him——he didn't act the way I expected when you found out. But when Joan went off the deep end—nothing seemed to stand in his way then."

"Except me."

Her "yes" was small, almost inaudible.

Curling bronze hair, white skin, lovely face, he must look his last upon them. Even desire was forbidden. The hate which surged up in him at her shallowness was almost as great as his desire.



"Yes, Dorrie, I'm Through."

Something rose in his throat whic made it difficult to speak. He swallowed.

"No need to prolong this, is there?"

She started. "You're going?"

"You won't be afraid to stay alone tonight?"

She gave a gesture of dissent. "I'll be at Mother's. After you apply you'd better go away a bit —not far . . ." It was on his tongue to say "near enough for him to see you occasionally—keep him from other entanglements," but he checked it. He turned and left the room.

Hugh went back to his mother's house to live, occupied his old room in the south corner. He spent some evenings at his club, playing cards, others reading in the company of his mother, or in long rambles. Margery and Will were unobtrusively sympathetic when he met them; Kezia was crassly exultant.

"What a relief! We can have sage in our chicken dressing now!" Dorrie had disliked sage. But if Kezia saw Hugh's annoyed look when the radio moaned out a love song, she usually shut it off and dialed a different station. She made an effort to be more thoughtful of her mother in his presence, evidently wishing his approval. Once or twice she tried to discuss Jerry with him.

"Why do you give Jerry a mere nod when you come in? You could be civil—say a few sentences now and then. I tell him that it's just your way—one of those big, silent business men with the reconstruction of the nation on your shoulders —but I wish you'd be decent."

"It's no go, sis. I don't like him."

"How can you say that? You don't know him." She was aggrieved.

He rattled his paper as a signal that he wanted her to take herself from the arm of his chair so that he might read. "I think I do."

Their eyes met and a thwarted look crossed her face. She flounced off his chair with: "You'll all drive me to something one of these days! . . . No one takes me seriously!"

A few nights later he was sitting by the dying fire in the living-room, leaning forward, staring at the embers, when she came in a little after twelve.

Without giving her friends time to do anything in the way of farewell parties and bridal showers, Mary Pickford quietly booked passage to London for herself and her niece. Buddy Rogers took an earlier boat. If there is a lull of a few days during the production of the picture for which he is going to England, they will be married then; otherwise they will wait until he has finished the picture. Any girl who can make an outstanding hit in a picture in which the smoothly expert Myrna Loy and William Powell appear is not just good, she is marvelous. That is what directors on the M. G. In the midst of all the enthusiasm over her at the studio, everyone neglected to make sure that she had been put under contract. She didn't mention it because nobody asked her. And Paramount slyly came along and signed her up for their pictures.

Many actresses would be more than satisfied if they could sign a contract with Paramount guaranteeing them four hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year. But Carole Lombard insisted on adding clauses guaranteeing that Teddy Tetzlaff, her favorite camerman, would always photograph her. And that Pat Drew, studio electrician who lost a leg in a plane crash, would always be employed on her pictures.

Shirley Temple

Letters have poured into the Twentieth Century-Fox studios by the thousand begging that Shirley Temple play winsome little girl parts instead of the smart-aleck, wise-beyond-her-years blues singer of recent pictures. Many of the letters came from mothers whose daughters model their behavior on Shirley's latest picture. Taking their advice to heart, the studio selected "Wee Willie Winkie" as Shirley's next picture. If she does any imitation of Alice Faye or Tony Martin singing, or of Bill Robinson dancing, it will be away from the camera.

Home Heating Hints

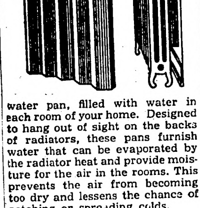
Avoid Unhealthy Dry Air—Keep Radiator Humidifier Pans Filled With Water.

MANY winter colds are caused by hot, dry air in the home while the season for burning the furnace is on. Heat, of course, absorbs the moisture in the air. This hot air also dries out and damages furniture.

You can easily and inexpensively provide for air-moisture by keeping a "pan humidifier," or hot water pan, filled with water in each room of your home. Designed to hang out of sight on the backs of radiators, these pans furnish water that can be evaporated by the radiator heat and provide moisture for the air in the rooms. This prevents the air from becoming too dry and lessens the chance of catching or spreading colds.



Warm air heating plants are equipped with humidifier pans. All you have to do is to keep them filled with fresh water.

Don't Sleep When Gas Presses Heart

If you want to really GET RID OF GAS and terrible bloating, don't expect to do it by just doctoring your stomach with harsh, irritating alkalies and "gas tablets." Most GAS is lodged in the stomach and upper intestine and is due to old poisonous matter in the constipated bowels that are loaded with ill-causing bacteria.

If your constipation is of long standing, enormous quantities of dangerous bacteria accumulate. Then your digestion is upset. GAS often presses heart and lungs, making life miserable.

You can't eat or sleep. Your head aches. Your back aches. Your complexion is sallow and pimply. Your breath is foul. You are a sick, grouchy, wretched, unhappy person. YOUR SYSTEM IS POISONED.

Thousands of sufferers have found in Adlerika the quick, scientific way to rid their systems of harmful bacteria. Adlerika rids you of gas and cleans foul poisons out of BOTH upper and lower bowels. Give your bowels a REAL cleansing with Adlerika. Get rid of GAS. Adlerika does not gripe —is not habit forming. At all Leading Druggists.

Watch Your Kidneys!

Help Them Cleanse the Blood of Harmful Body Waste

Your kidneys are constantly filtering waste matter from the blood stream. But kidneys sometimes lag in their work—do not act as Nature intended—fail to remove impurities that, if retained, may poison the system and upset the whole body machinery.

Symptoms may be nagging backache, persistent headache, attacks of dizziness, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes—a feeling of nervous anxiety and loss of pep and strength.

Other signs of kidney or bladder disorder may be burning, scanty or too frequent urination.

There should be no doubt that prompt treatment is wiser than neglect. Use Doan's Pills. Doan's have been winning new friends for more than forty years. They have a nation-wide reputation. Are recommended by grateful people the country over. Ask your neighbor!

Think It Over

The first semester of the school year 1936-37 has now reached its close.

We are at present laboring in a new portion of this term and have only about four months left to carry forth efforts in which we failed in the first semester.

Let us look back and over the area which we have already covered of our 1936-37 trail.

Have we done, unquestioning, those things we were assumed to do? Have we implicitly obeyed all the rules made for our conduct? Have we treated our classmates and instructors with courtesy and respect? Or have we merely satisfied our own selfish pleasures?

What can we as students answer to these questions? If we have been guilty of great negligence in those things that we should have done, we should realize how extremely fortunate we are to have another trial, a second semester, in which to prove that we really can do what we are supposed to and bring forth great results.

Let's begin immediately to improve ourselves and our school in the remaining portion of this school year.

Mud Lake Bill Becomes Law

The Mud Lake Bill, sponsored by the Board of County Commissioners, County Attorney A. A. Trost and Rasmus Hage, who was attorney for some of the school districts in the Mud Lake area, has passed both houses of the Legislature and was signed by the Governor last Friday, making it law. It is known as Chapter 15. Senator Rice and Representative Morberg introduced the bill in their respective legislative bodies.

The law provides "that the indebtedness of any school district or township lying wholly or partially within said area shall be paid out of said fund to the extent that the assessed value of the land of such district or township lying within such school district or township based upon the last assessment prior to the filing of the petition for condemnation of said land."

This law assures school districts and townships adjacent to the project will not have to assume the share of bonded and floating indebtedness that were originally levied against lands in the area.

Annual Creamery Meeting

The Stockholders and Patrons of the Farmers' Cooperative creamery here held their annual meeting at the Community Hall last Thursday afternoon. A very large crowd came in for the meeting as the weather was fine for this time of the year.

The anmual report was read and explained by Walter Larson, manager of the creamery, and proved very satisfactory to the patrons. Mr. Larson stated that the institution had a net gain of $306.37 for the past year after all expenses were paid.

The creamery has 225 patrons who in 1936 produced 864,282 pounds of cream which they delivered to the creamery here. From this the creamery manufactured 244,195.7 pounds of butter from which they received $92,617.96. The average net price received for all butter manufactured was 30.77c. The average net price paid for all butterfat was 34.98c.

Mr. Lager, field man for this district spoke on the good business this creamery had done the past year and also stated that through the management of Mr. Larson the patrons of this creamery could look forword to a good year in 1937.

Verner Nelson, publisher of the Holt Weekly News, and who also publishes two good Farmer Labor papers at Roseau and Warren, spoke on cooperation and salaries paid those who take care of such a big business as running a large creamery.

Snow Battle Costs $615,000

Fighting heavier snows than in 1935-1936, the state highway department has had to spend $615,090 battling snow on trunk roads the first four months of the winter, October, November, December and January, according to an announcement by N. W. Elsberg, state commissioner of highways. This sum is equivalent to the cost of bituminous surfacing approximately 341 miles of trunk highway.

With Northwestern, Western and Southwestern Minnesota hardest hit, Virginia having a record of 84 inches (seven feet) of snow, the department has kept the main highways open for all but a few hours and secondary roads have not been tied up more than two days in any instance, Mr. Elsberg said. The state, due to the heavy snow, has been forced to go to the assistance of several counties, extending the work of the regular highway crews.

Stretching across the state is approximately 6,000,000 feet of snow fence, the erecting, maintenance and removal of which will cost approximately $225,000. While the snow is heavier this year, fortunately there hasn't been as much wind as last season, when $800,000 was spent in snow removal in a single month, February, and approximately $1,500,000 was needed for snow removal for the year, a part of the $8,000,000 maintenance expense.

Snow removal expense so far in 1936-1937 is running about the same as in 1935-1936, Mr. Elsberg said, but highway crews have been able to do a better job in keeping the highways open, due to lower drifts. In numerous cases highway plows have preceded doctors and ambulances in their work of mercy in the rural districts. County highways have been opened up when county equipment, heavily overtaxed, was unable to do the job, and state equipment was available.

Requests from local governmental units for such state departmental assistance, made possible on a contract basis by the 1935 legislature, have been far greater this year than ever before.

Particularly bad spots this year have been near Marshall, Pipestone, Slayton and Windom, practically the same places that caused the most trouble last year

Heavy ice coatings the early part of the winter added to the problem for highway crews and tons of sand, treated with calcium chloride, were spread over the highways. Much of this ice has now worn off, or is covered with snow, reducing the danger of skidding. Poor visibility has hampered the work of the mainterance men, in some instances forcing snow removal equipment off the highways for hours at a time.

Flood Aftermath Reveals Sinister Scene

Scene in a Cincinnati street after the turbulent waters of the Ohio had receded. Rubble carried by the swollen river for hundreds of miles was left high and dry on city streets when the crest of the flood passed on, leaving scenes of ruin in its wake.

Schooled in War, They Deal in Mercy

Militia of the Ohio National Guard are pictured by a field kitchen as they prepare food for flood sufferers A group of the refugees are lined up at the right as they await the call "Soup's On."

HE CAN TAKE IT!

This youngster found a temporary home in a box car when the Mississippi river flood drove him from his own home. He took flood discomfort in his stride. One thing that may account for his obvious high spirits was the fact that water shortage eliminated his Saturday night bath and the daily scrubbing behind the ears. It was estimated that more than 1,000,000 people in the Ohio and Mississippi valleys were rendered homeless by the flood. The known dead were estimated in excess of 400. Contributions by citizens everywhere to the special relief fund of the Red Cross were more than $17,000,000. The storm's damage was estimated at close to a billion dollars.

FLED RIVER'S WRATH

This aged inhabitant who fled the rich Mississippi bottom lands in the face of the raging flood waters of "Ol' Man River," has a startled stare for the photographer who snapped him at his refugee camp in Memphis.

Box Car Becomes Home for Refugees

Box car home of flood refugees driven from their farm homes near Ridgely, Tenn., by the flood waters of the raging Mississippi. With all the discomfort and suffering caused by the greatest flood in the history of the Ohio and Mississippi valleys, these flood victims could still smile.

Red Cross Aids Flood Sufferers

Here's where your dimes, quarters and dollars went when you "earmarked" them for Red Cross relief. Grandma Donsky, who vows that in all her years she has never seen such a disaster, is seen receiving an allotment of sorely needed groceries at the Louisville Red Cross station.

We've a Date to Sew!

OH GRACE, before you go—you're not in a hurry, are you—notice Mabel's slip.

Isn't that the one that you were telling the girls about at the Bid-Or-Bi club last week, Mabel?

Yes, it's my Sew-Your-Own and I'm real proud of it because it fits so smoothly. There's no bunchiness at the waistline or hips—it's fitted, you see—and yet there's lots of room around the bottom. And do you know how long it took me to make it—no self praise, but exactly two hours by the clock. I simply followed the pattern's instruction chart—as easy to do as to concoct a new dessert.

Tie, Buttons, Hat to Match.

It would be grand for a tailored dress like mine, wouldn't it, Mabel?

Just the thing! Are you off to the Civic League luncheon at the Hall? Your dress made up beautifully in that aquamarine, Grace. I'm crazy about it. The yoke-and-sleeves-in-one idea is swell and the black tie and buttons to match your hat make you look like Mrs. Merriweather herself.

Now, now, cut the rave. You know that neat-but-not-gaudy is my motto. Bye, I'll see you in print.

So long . . . Anne, since you like my slip so much, I'll be glad to help you make one like it, if you want me to.

That's lovely of you, Mabel, but would that sort of thing be right for a "Stylish Stout" like me? You should hear George when I call myself a "Stylish Stout." He says I flatter myself.

That Slenderizing Effect.

Leave it to the men! This slip would be especially good for you, Anne, because it's fitted and, George or no George, you look stylish in that dress you're wearing—but you DON'T look stout. The panel in front breaks the skirt line, and the jabot and collar do wonders for the "Buzzum." It would be grand made up in a flowered print for Spring, Anne.

That very idea occurred to me. Why don't we get together tomorrow afternoon and sew—are you game? Come to my house. I baked a batch of oatmeal cookies today.

It's a date, Anne, I'll be over in the morning as soon as the kids are off to school.

CAPITOL NEWS REVIEW

It is interesting to note that although Minnesota's Legislature has already considered over 1,000 measures, has well attended sessions and conducts numerous pubic hearings on important measures, the Legislatures of other states have hardly begun to function. Reports from Illinois, Iowa, and other states indicate that activity is at low ebb and that legislation of the high caliber under discussion in Minnesota is not being approached. Observers here proudly point to what liberals can do when given the reins.

The House tax committee recommended for passage the administra tion income tax bill which would to an estimated $17,000,000. Major-increase revenue from this source ity leaders are planning to move for House action on this measure soon, so that it may be sent along to the Senate in plenty of time to avert any complaints about losing the plan in the last minute rush.

The House public domain committee approved another part of the Governor's program is sanctioning Representative Stockwell's measure to allow issuance of up to $50,000,000 in bond to finance public water projects in Minnesota. The House leaders likewise hope to push this measure along quickly so that the Senate may have it at anearly date.

The oleomargarine bill is now up to the Senate, where it is undergoing a series of hearings with indications that it might not fare so well with the reactionaries as it did with the liberal House, which has passed it. It would give indirect aid to farmers by taxing oleomargarine to the extent that its manufacturers may not be able to undersell Minnesota farmers, many of whom have dairying as their main industry.

While President Roosevelt's recommended reform of the Supreme Court is a good one as a temporary expedient, it holds no permanent solution for the problem of the five man dictatorship that the bare majority of the court now holds over the land.

Lasting reform must take away from the Court the power of nullifying progressive legislation passed by Congress, and this can best be accomplished by ammendment to the Constitution.

One thing is certain, however, and that is that the country can not move forward with necessary social legislation until it first removes the throttle-hold of its reactionary court.

A nation-wide poll by the American Institute of Public Opinion shows that approximately one-fifth of the voters of the country would join a new Farmer-Labor Party were one to be formed today. This means that a Farmer-Labor presidential ticket at this time would receive about 8,000,000 votes.

The results should be very encouraging to those who believe in a National Farmer-Labor party. Most encouraging of all is the poll taken inthe South, which showed a 21 per cent sentiment in favor of a new party.

Unquestionably, the great bulk of the liberals ofAmerica still look to the Democratic party under Roosevelt as the vehicle for bringing about the necessary economic and governmental changes. But after Roosevelt what? It is time to give this question some thought. There is evidence that the reactionaries in the democratic party may gain control. If the party swings back to the right, as it will probably do, America's liberals have no other choice than to embark upon a political movement of their own.

The American Institute of Public Opinion poll points in the direction of a successful national Farmer-Labor Party in 1940. The ground work should be laid now.

Co-operatives in Minnesota had a big year during 1935-36. They maintained their reord of having the largest membership of any other state in the union and they increased their volume of business a quarter of a million dollars, accoruing to Farm Credit Administration.

The Gopher state has 380,000 members while Illinois is second with 334,540; Iowa, third with 289,130, and Wisconsin fourth with a membership of 217,050.

Drouth and Depression only served to heighten the growth of the cooperatives, which took in half a million persons. The largest advance was in the purchasing coops, although their strength is not yet comparable with that of the marketing association.

Representative Harold Peterson, Willmar, newly elected Secretary-treasurer of the Farmer-Labor Assn., will go to Washington next week as the personal representative of Governor Elmer A. Benson to attend a nation-wide gathering of young people, called together to appeal for enactment of the American Youth Bill, which the Governor sponsored in the last session of Congress.

It is expected that 2,000 delegates will attend the Washington Pilgrimage, representing church groups, Y. W. C. A.'s Y. M. C. A.'s, unions and various other political and economic youth groups.

Governor Elmer A. Benson this week blamed Victor Christgau, state W. P. A. Administrator, for failure to present an accurate picture of conditions in Minnesota's drouth area, thus unnecessarily delaying aid to thousands of farm families.

The Governor stated: "An accurate picture is more than a matter of statistics. I blame Mr. Christgau for his consistent failure and outright refusal to present to federal officials not written satistical reports but an aggressive and sympathetic interpretation of human needs in this state."

Sit-down strikers who had occupied General Motors plants for six weeks went home vitorious at the finish of the most titanic labor struggle in American history.

The United Automobile Workers Union won sole bargaining rights in 20 General Motors plants for the next six months, and negotiations between union heads and officials begin immediately on other demands such as wages and hours and reduction of production speed-up methods.

The auto workers are affiliated with the C. I. O., potent industrial union group headed by John Lewis' United Mine Workers. Lewis represented the workers in making the agreement. Announcing the victory, Lewis declared: "It is another milestone in labor's march! It establishes for the first time a rational relationship in the auto industry."

Interest in Nebraska's one-house Legislature was repealed in bills introduced in both houses asking for a redistricting of the state so that the lower house would have 88 members and the senate 44. The bills were offered by Representatives Rollin Anderson, Forest Lake; Richard Tighe, Wayzata; and Senator McLeod, Grand Rapids.

O. H. and R. B. Taralseth returned Sunday from the Cities where they had attended Market Week.

Mansfield Murney, Warren Lundgren and Berlye Bossman were Thief River Falls visitors on Thursday.

Mrs. A. J. Kelsvin, sister of J. H. Herbranson who runs the Hotel at Bagely was a week end visitor at the Warren Hotel.

Uncle Phil Says:

Judging Self

To judge and examine one's self is a labor full of profit.

The vein of gold in many a man is seldom taken for a yellow streak even by the dullest.

Paying cash for what one wants is a good way to break the habit of wanting so much.

When a man becomes thoroughly contented he has outlived his usefulness.

A man may not be a hero to his valet, but there are multitudes of heroes who have none.

It's Often Needed

One thing about the School of Experience—you can always take a post-graduate course.

This earth owes a hen a living, too; but she has sense enough to scratch for it.

Some are so easy-going that they don't take the trouble to nail a lie if it doesn't affect them.

If you are too smart for some people, they admire you, but seek other company.

Anticipated Pleasures

Why do we always wish time to hasten? Is it because our anticipated pleasures are so superior to our actual ones?

When we don't like certain manners and certain manifestations of bad taste, we are not necessarily snobs.

One gets two enjoyments out of going into debt. One when he borrows the money, the other when he pays it back.

Love as an Ideal

Let the child early feel love as an ideal, for he will adjust himself to the world later.

Righteous indignation is a plague to you if you can't do anything.

To make better men it is necessary to begin with the children. That's what McGuffey's Readers did.

Dr. Pierce's Pleasant Pellets are an effective laxative. Sugar coated. Children like them. Buy now!—Adv.

Try It

Pleasing yourself is admittedly agreeable. Pleasing others is, too.

Check it before it gets you down. Check it before others, maybe the children, catch it. Check it with FOLEY'S HONEY & TAR. This double-acting compound gives quick relief and speeds recovery. Soothes raw, irritated tissues; quickly allays tickling, hacking. Spoonful on retiring makes for a cough-free sleep. No habit-forming, stomach-upsetting drugs. Ideal for children, too. Don't let that cough due to a cold hang on! For quick relief and speeded recovery insist on FOLEY'S HONEY & TAR.

Strength in Truth

Truth is a strong thing—let man's life be true!

Stomach Gas So Bad Seems To Hurt Heart

"The gas on my stomach was so bad I could not eat or sleep. Even my heart seemed to hurt. A friend suggested Adlerika. The first dose I took brought me relief. Now I eat as I wish, sleep fine and never felt better." —Mrs. Jas. Filler.

Adlerika acts on BOTH upper and lower bowels while ordinary laxatives act on the lower bowel only. Adlerika gives your system a thorough cleansing, bringing out old, poisonous matter that you would not believe was in your system and that has been causing gas pains, sour stomach, nervousness and headaches for months.

Dr. H. L. Shoub, New York, reports: "In addition to intestinal cleansing, Adlerika greatly reduces bacteria and colon bacilli."

Give your bowels a REAL cleansing with Adlerika and see how good you feel. Just one spoonful relieves GAS and stubborn constipation. At all Leading Druggists.

WEAK and MISERABLE

Mrs. F. C. Herington of 1300 E. Collins St., Austin, Minn., said: "Some years ago I was awfully nervous and weak and hardly felt ill; doing a thing because of my weakened condition. I used Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription as a tonic over a period of several weeks and I was relieved of the headache and other discomforts associated with functional disturbances, wasn't nearly so nervous, could eat more and gained in weight." ## CHAPTER XI—Continued

—22—

"Up so late, big brother? How come?"

He turned from his introspective thoughts. "'Lo, Kezzie. I waited up for you. After midnight again? . . . I'll have to look after, you a bit."

If Kezia was annoyed she restrained herself. "Sorry. If I'd known you were waiting, I'd have come sooner."

"Jerry?"

She nodded and tossed her beret in the air, caught it. "Chasing dewy adventure out at Brierlands."

"Did you catch up with it?"

"Yes, but found it rather dull after I did. I used to have a better time——"

Hugh smiled. "You mean when things are new——?"

"You get such a zip out of them when they are new!" She sighed. "But the boys look down on you unless you accept things with savoir faire. So you learn to do it whether you feel that way inside or not. Presently that is the way you do feel—the kick all gone!"

"'To get nowhere—follow the crowd!'" quoted Hugh. "I'd say you were missing youth, Kezzie, when you sacrifice the kick. But I'm an aged thirty, not competent to judge!"

Kezia stood over him, ran her fingers through his hair, twisted a lock between her thumb and finger. "Got the toothache, Hughie?" she inquired softly.

"No worse than usual." A charred log broke in two, sent up a blue flame for a moment around the whitened edges. He rose, put the screen around the fire. "Time we were going to bed."

"Mother gone?"

"A couple of hours ago."

"Don't you want to sit here and talk to me?"

His left eyebrow lifted. "You can be sweet at times!"

His eyelids twitched a little as he gazed at the floor. "Kezzie, about Mother . . . she had a pain in her arm before she went to bed. I rubbed it with liniment. I'm sure you could make things easier for her. She doesn't look well; this has been hard on her. Won't you look after her a bit? See that she doesn't overdo? Your clothes, for instance. You really should see to them yourself."

"Yes, I will," promised Kezia.

"And if she could sleep late, have her breakfast in bed? Couldn't you get up and attend to the ordering and running of the house?"

She gave him a dazzling smile. "I'll do anything you say, darling. I know I'm careless, but I haven't meant to be selfish." She clasped her hands around his wrist, leaned her cheek against his sleeve.

"Good," said Hugh relieved. His opinion of Kezia ran through such infinite modifications. She was so incalculable, never twice alike. He felt a warming tender glow toward her.

"And if I do that for you, will you do something for me?"

"Name it," said Hugh without thinking.

"Will you get Jerry a decent job in your plant, something with good pay and a future to it?"

Hugh gave a short laugh, drew away from her.

"Please, Hughie—please."

"So you were bargaining? Weren't you concerned over your mother?"

"That goes without saying. But this means such a lot to me—you can manage it!"

"A soft job with fat pay?" Any job at all is scarce in a steel plant. As soon as we can manage it we take back our old men whom we laid off."

Kezia gave a deep sigh; her eyes swam in mist. "Oh, Hugh, you aren't going to let us down? I counted on you."

"Us?"

"Certainly."

"Don't you see he's using you to help himself along? He wants you to ask me, your brother, for a good position! Why doesn't he apply in the regular way—go state his qualifications to Kelly Burns who has charge of that?"

"Don't blame him. I thought of it."

"Does he know you're asking me?"

"Ye-es."

He gave a shrug.

"He doesn't want a soft job," she hurried to say. "He wants something with a chance at advancement—something he'll never get where he is. "Speak to this Burns," she coaxed, "just speak to him! Won't you do this tiny favor for me, Hugh?"

He shook his head. "No, Kezia. He's lucky to have work—if you ask me. Tell him to take good care of the job he has!"

"You're heartless," she moaned. "I'm going to ask Uncle John Renshaw," she threatened.

The monotonous days of November dragged by with a preponderance of leaden skies, of chill, of fog; church and club activities started up; orders slackened at the plant, started up on rush business, died down again.

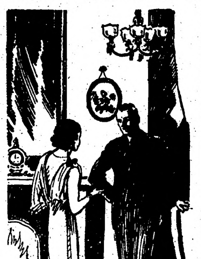
Dorrie applied for a divorce on the grounds of incompatibility. Hugh thought he was all braced for it, but it came as a shock when the papers were served on him, and again when he stared at the newspaper and saw their names linked together in the public admission of defeat.

His mother made cheerful conversation when he felt like talking, served his favorite dishes at the table. She accepted him naturally without reference to his wife—just her son who had been away from home for a few years and had returned.

Dorrie's name never crossed her lips. Instinctively she knew the throb which accompanies a name associated with fatality, realized that Hugh's nerves had not grown the protective layer which would allow him to hear it without agitation.

She showed him some colored pictures of French villages in a magazine one night. "I have the wanderlust at heart, and I've always wanted to see France. Notre Dame, the Seine, the Place de la Concorde, the Bois de Boulogne—and I've kept up my school French by reading Anatole France and de Maupassant in the hope that I might go there some day. I've seen most of my own country—I had hoped that Europe would be my next adventure."

Hugh examined the pictures, not from interest, but from the wish to respond. "It's not impossible at all—you and Kezzie might go next summer. She'd like it."



"You're Heartless," She Moaned.

She shook her head. "I wouldn't leave you."

"Nonsense—why not? Satisfy your wanderlust, Fluvanna!"

Her eyes looked as if she were seeing distant things. "I won't plan ahead. Time has taught me the folly of that."

"Why not plan? Would it tempt you if I said I would try to come over and bring you home?"

"Even that would be leaving you—not seeing you for a while." She paused; her voice became almost inaudible. "These days—are precious to me in a way you don't know about, Hugh."

CHAPTER XII

"You talked to him then, Beautiful?"

Kezia's face assumed an expression of silken discontent. "Mmmm."

"No results!"

"None."

"Comments?"

"He crabbed about the men they laid off at the plant and had to take on as work picked up; he said you should go to Kelly Burns who hires them."

"Never mind. I expect you did the best you could. Providence wasn't willing! It is—or it isn't! . . . Shall we drive to Brookline? Too far? . . . Cold?"

"Not much." Kezia shivered. "You might run up that window a bit . . . There—that's better."

"Your brother doesn't like me, but that," said Jerry, heroically, "doesn't keep me from seeing what a fine fellow he is! I hear it on all sides—'Hugh Marsh—a prince of a chap'!"

"Hugh is pretty swell."

The car crossed a bridge with a rattling of planks and made a rather chugging progress up a hill.

"Cousin Gavin probably would have taken you in his bank," said Kezia reflectively. "Didn't Lizzie say he would?"

"Once," admitted Jerry.

"Until I threw the cat in the electric fan!" teased Kezia.

"Woman," cried Jerry with vehemence, "I'll—kiss you!" He suited the action to the word swiftly. "Now will you be quiet?"

"Like a mice!" She laughed and leaned possessively against his shoulder.

Jerry's voice came to her with seductive sweetness above the roar of the noisy engine. "It's you, gorgeous, I'm thinking of. I want to marry you, but how can we do it on twenty-five a week?"

"You're so practical."

"A fellow has to stop and think occasionally. I adore you, precious—too much to tie you up to poverty! Sometimes I think——"

School Notes
High School

Junior: Beatrice Larson

The Commercial Geography class has completed the study of South American countries, including the work in their work books.

We wonder if some of the students aren't like Columbus. When they go, they don't know where they're going; when they get there they don't know where they are; and when they get home they don't know where they've been.

The American History class is studying the period of history from Hayes to Harrison.

Marian brought a flying squirrel to Biology class last Friday. Judging from screams heard between 2:30 and 3:00 o'clock, some of the students didn't care much about it.

The English 2 class wrote short stories last week. Some of them were very interesting.

Found: A complete new golf outfit. Mr. Nybakken.

Lost: My brains. A Freshie.

Something wrong with the reporters and Editor, I guess.

Good luck, amen.

The Party, As Seen By Upperclassmen.

Probably it was the Want Ad inserted in last week's school notes that prompted the Freshmen to give the upperclassmen a party.

Nevertheless it was a real party filled with fun for all, that the freshies sponsored on Friday.

The enjoyable afternoon began with games after which valentines were handed out.

By matching hearts, (paper ones) we found our partners for a delicious lunch served by the verdant frosh.

We, as upperclassmen, take this means of expressing our thanks for the grand party.

Safetygrams
BY FRED W. BRAUN
The Safety Man

The more one studies statistics and records, the more puzzling they become.

Comparatively few accidents occur at points where dangers are easily recognized by the driver. This is true even though the danger may be unusually pronouuced. For example, traveling over a narrow, winding, mountain road is as a rule comparatively safe for here the motorist usually takes extraordinary precaution.

On the other hand, a great many accidents may occur under safe conditions because the motorist, lulled by a sense of false security, lets down his guard for the time being and forgets all about safety.

A car inspected often means a hazard corrected.

Mrs. W. S. Risberg and daughters of Gonvick, Mrs. L. Wegge, Mrs. Jesse Sorum, Mrs. A. T. Hagen, Mrs. A. Krogen, Mrs. A. Bennes, and Mrs. H. O. Hanson visited at the John Hagberg home Saturday afternoon and helped Mrs. Hagberg celebrate her 56th birthday.

A group of girls and boys had a birthday party for Dorothy Mae Hanson at her parental home on Friday afternoon. Those present were the members of the 4th grade at school. After lunch they all enjoyed skating on the rink. Dorothy received many nice gifts and a sum of money.

Several people from here attended the Roseau—Thief River Falls hockey game at Thief River Falls on Wednesday evening. According to reports it was a lively scrap with Thief River coming out ahead for a score of four to two.

Mr. and Mrs. Geo. Fricker and Boy visited with Mike Fricker at St. Hilaire Sunday.

A. L. Carlson returned home Monday from a buying trip to Minneapolis.

Mrs. A. Lindholm of Strandquist spent the week end at the Mrs. C. Sandberg home.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Mork of Newfolden called at the parsonage Sunday evening.

Word was received here by Rev. Hanson on Saturday that his mother, Mrs. H. T. Hanson of Milan was seriously ill. According to latest reports she is much improved.

No Muskrat Season In 1937

Although the state Conservation Commission may soon be abolished by the Legislature, three of its five members met last week and voted to permit no open season on muskrats in 1937.

The 1936 muskrat season was extended five days because of weather conditions unfavorable for trapping. At that time it was agreed that there would be no open season in 1937.

Questionnaires recently sent to game wardens indicate that there has been a decrease of muskrats in most counties. According to Gordon Fredine, game and fish biologist, it is impractical to have a muskrat season in only a few counties because it concentrates trapping and encourages illegal transportation of muskrats from closed to open counties.

Farmer-Labor Party Needed

One thing labor ought to learn from the General Motors strike is the need for a Farmer-Labor party everywhere with progressive officials and judiaciary that is willing to protect that portion of the public that lies outside the $367,000 a-year executives.

Contrast the handling of the strike Gov. Murphy of Michigan has shown with methods used in Minnesota by the late Governor Olson in the truck strikes and Governor Benson in the lumberjacks dispute. The Michigan governor called out the National Guard to intimidate strikers, and the Michigan judges refused to enforce labor's legal right to bargain collectively.

What Motor Lords Sloan, Raskob, Durant and the DuPonts fail to see is that they did not create the wealth they have rolled in for the last twenty years. If it had not been for labor unions fighting for and obtaining better wages so that they and their families could afford the luxury of a car, there would have been no General Motors and no $367,000 salaries to pay the Sloans of the motor world.

Proposed Research Fund

A Floyd B. Olson Cancer Research Fund is proposed in a bill offered to the lower House this week by Represenative George McKinnon, Minneapolis. The research would be conducted at the University of Minnesota's hospital, and will be concerned with investigating and caring for victims of cancer. Under the bill the state will provide $50,000 a year beginning in the fiscal year 1937, and all proceeds from the research will be turned into the fund.

Mother of Our First President

THE girl who was to become the mother of George Washington was something of a belle in her native colony, Virginia. Mary Ball, descended from a good English family, was called "the rose of Epping Forest" in her girlhood, Epping Forest being the name of the Ball homestead. Orphaned early, she had as her guardian George Eskridge, a wealthy Virginia planter.

At twenty-two, Mary Ball married (on March 6, 1730) Augustine Washington, then a widower with two little boys. Her first child she named George after her old family friend. Five other children were born of this marriage, four of whom survived. When Augustine Washington died, she was left with a brood of youngsters to care for. George was then only eleven. Fortunately, however, states a writer in the Indianapolis News, the husband had provided for them amply.

George Washington was still a young boy when he became possessed of a great desire to be a midshipman. His mother had been half-hearted about this plan at all times, but finally (so the story goes) when his sea-chest was being carried down to the wharf by a porter, she refused to let him go. He accepted her decision with good grace, and devoted himself to surveying instead. His activities in the next years often took him far away from her and gradually prepared him for the great role he was to play in American history.

Mary Ball Washington was sixty-eight when the revolution began. Since communication was then so primitive, she often did not know for months at a time whether her son was alive or dead. Yet she maintained outward calm and courage. One of her sayings was, "The mothers and wives of brave men must be brave women." The members of her household knew, though, that every day she went off by herself with her Bible to a quiet spot called Meditation Rock.

Mary Ball at 22, When She Wed Augustine Washington.

At last Cornwallis surrendered in 1781 and the revolution was won. Ever mindful of his mother's anxiety for him, Washington sent off a courier at once to bear her the news.

Mary Ball Washington lived to be over eighty, mentally keen and unfailingly cheerful. She died in 1789, the year her son was elected first President of the United States.

Couple Married In Oregon

Word was received here that Miss Palma Johnson and Elmer Nohre, of Yoncalla Oregon, both well known in Holt, were united in marriage at Drain, Oregon, by Rev. Helseth, Lutheran pastor there.

The bride is a daughter of Mrs. Paul Hoffman of Yoncalla and the groom a son of Mrs. S. H. Nohre of Holt. They have lived in Yoncalla since last fall, when they went there with Mr. and Mrs. Paul Hoffman and family.

For the wedding the bride was attired in a navy blue swagger suit with hat and accessories to match, and carried a boquet of pink and white flowers. After the ceremony a wedding dinner was served by Mr. and Mrs. Hofiman at their home. A beautifully decorated wedding cake centered the table.

The newlyweds will make their home in Yoncalla where the groom is employed.

Safetygrams
BY FRED W. BRAUN
The Safety Man

Very often we read about accidents that are caused by faulty brakes. We give the matter very little attention at the time and usually pass on to something else. Upon careful analysis of these accidents, you will find that nothing can be farther from the truth.

Brakes do not get faulty all of a sudden. It is the process of wear and tear, hard and often unfair usuage that makes them weak. The fault is not with the brakes but with the driver.

There is usually plenty of warning when brakes begin to weaken, and when they do it is necessary to see that they are repaired or replaced at once.

After they have been tightened or relined, as the case may be, be sure that they will not burn or lock. Attend to those brakes in time.

—23—

A premonitory shiver went through Kezia. "What do you think?"

"That it might be better for us to break it off."

Kezia sat bolt upright. He would go back to Ellen! . . . People would say he had thrown her over! . . . She had a feeling for Jerry that no one else had ever stirred. He brought a swift challenge to her. He was elusive; he never satiated her with his dependence.

Jerry guided the car to a bumpy pause on the shoulder of the road, switched off the ignition. "Come here," he said gently. He gathered her in his arms, laid his cheek against hers. "She cares . . . my little Kezia cares," he whispered. She felt his lips tremble as they touched hers.

"You want to give me up!"

"No, Angel, no! . . . I love you—you know I do."

"You've been horrid."

He gave a despairing gesture. "It seems so hopeless."

"We won't allow it to be hopeless."

He was silent for a moment, keeping his arms tightly about her. "No?" he questioned. Another long pause then he said, "Have you anything to suggest?"

"We might live with Mother."

Life was very dreary, thought Kezia, when you couldn't have what you wanted! And Jerry was the right combination for her. Just the way his hair went back was invested with a certain quality of emotion; the sulky fullness over his dark eyes sent warm waves up her arms into her shoulders. She was caught up in that attribute of youth which drives for what it wants, mistakes or not, the imperious urge which cannot wait for wisdom.

"Yes, we could live with Mother," she said a little more firmly.

The hesitation on Jerry's face deepened. "Yes, that's a thought to hold to! . . . Have Hugh patronize me?"

"He wouldn't."

"I can see him welcoming me to the family circle—big boy they had to keep!" His tone was rueful.

"It would be for only a little while," she coaxed. "You'll get something good in a few months. Perhaps Hugh would . . . then."

"Do you think so?" His voice, still uncertain, was slightly yielding.

"And Uncle John Renshaw—not really my uncle, but a cousin of Mother's—has a weakness for me. I think if I went to him, asked him very prettily, told him how fond I am of him—and of you—he'd try to help."

"He might do something," said Jerry thoughtfully. "No matter how good you are, it's pull and family that put a fellow up. I've seen it happen too many times not to know. And if I made just a little more—say forty or fifty a week—you'd be willing to try it, Loveliness?"

Kezia nodded, her eyes like stars. He started the car. They drove for a mile or so when the headlights swept a sign on a curve of the hill: "Brookline. Marriage Licenses. No Waiting."

Kezia smiled to herself as she turned it over in her mind. Why, it actually stood there as if it were suggesting a way for them! There might be advantages to it. She chuckled a little and he turned to her inquiringly.

"I was thinking about that sign on the hill—the one about marriage licenses."

"What about it?"

"Think!" she commanded. "Then tell me if you are thinking the same thing I am."

His eyes gleamed with swift intelligence. "You wouldn't——?"

She snuggled her face against his sleeve. "Funny boy—it would work, wouldn't it? . . . All over and done with . . . everyone would have to put a good face on about it! . . . Is it a grand idea or isn't it?"

"Not give a hang for the future? Let it take care of itself?"

"It would—it would!" she chanted gleefully. "I know my family—they're very loyal. Once it's done and over with they'd——"

"Have to like it?"

"They'd help us—Hugh, Uncle John, Will Platt."

Excitement played over Jerry's face, excitement and something more. He drove with one hand slowly while his right arm encircled her. "And I'd have you for keeps, darling Kezzie!"

In Brookline which was just over the Pennsylvania border, it was not difficult to be directed to the frame house of John Bascome, the marrying squire. He was a small man, with a round head, and close-set eyes. He looked greedily pleased at their appearance, surveyed them with quick speculation, and exacted a good sized fee from Jerry before he asked the necessary questions. He would have the marriage license made out and would mail it to them in a day or so. His wife and daughter appeared as witnesses.

Margery and Will Platt had been over for dinner, and afterward, Hugh and Will discussed the last municipal election and the calibre of the men in office. The talk, with Fluvanna and Margery, making comments, asking questions, switched to national affairs, to the labor situation and to the revolution in business methods.

Hugh was restless after they left. Now that the interlude of having to make conversation and listen to others was over, he was conscious of a slump. "I think I'll go for a walk, Mother."

He had reached for his hat when the front door bell pealed sharply. He took the telegram the boy handed him, signed for it, tore it open. "The fool! the little fool!" he ejaculated.

"Why, Hugh?" questioned Fluvanna.

So this was what Kezia had meant when she said "You'll all drive me to something one of these days!" He hesitated a moment before he handed the message to his mother. "From Kezia . . . she's done what we hoped to prevent—married him."

Fluvanna read: "Jerry and I were married in Brookline this evening. Home in a day or so. Very happy. Tell mother. Love. Kezia."

Kezia and Jerry came home to live. Jerry was devoted to Kezia, thoughtful of Fluvanna.

Uncle John Renshaw, after much wheedling from Kezia, found a place for Jerry in some government work at a better salary. An interview with Jerry predisposed him in his favor and he recommended that he go to a school for salesmen that his company was promoting. Kezia was triumphant. She did not see the trying, intermediate steps of a salesman's life; her imagination visioned Jerry as a trusted steel salesman with trips to California, New York, South America, Russia. She immediately went out and rented a two-room apartment, had the excitement of finding furnishings for it with the check furnished by her mother and Hugh, and moved in the week after Christmas.

In January Dorrie got her decree, and a few days later was married to Cunningham Whitney, whose divorce had been granted in December. They were married at her sister's home in Forest Hills and went to live in Philadelphia where Cun had secured a position.

Hugh frequently was invited to dinners at the houses of his friends, parties which were dull or lively according to the company. It was a wrench to go but he made it a point to accept most of the invitations. People, places, things which were normal were the best antidote for the perils of introspection.

He saw Gavin Pendleton one noon at a director's meeting, and thought he looked much older. Gavin touched Hugh's arm as they were leaving the meeting. "H'r yuh?"

"Very well. And you?"

Gavin looked meaningly back at the room they were leaving and Hugh understood that he wished to speak to him privately. He followed him back to its farther corner.

"Mother well?" blurted Gavin.

"Rather frail this winter. How is Lizzie—and Ellen?"

Gavin's left cheek and eye twitched, giving the effect of a grimace. "Wanted to speak to you . . . puzzled . . . don't know what to do."

Hugh waited.

"One of the family . . . like your advice. Ellen."

"Ellen?" said Hugh with quick concern. "Something wrong with Ellen?"

Gavin nodded gloomily. "Won't eat . . . hardly talks . . . sometimes I think . . . Mother not good for her." He peered at Hugh with his near-sighted eyes. "What to do?"

"Have you had a doctor?"

"Umm-m," he assented. "Tonics and iron no good—nerves."

"Young friends?"

"She won't go . . . did for a while . . . says people terrify her."

"You might send her away."

"Sent her to Louise in December—sister—Boston—after that—came out." He shrugged his shoulders and Hugh felt he referred to Kezia's elopement. "No good . . . came back in ten days . . . says she's haunted . . . funny stuff."

"She used to be fond of Mother, came to see her almost every day—and Mother has missed her very much," said Hugh. "My sister isn't there now. Perhaps she would like to come over . . . you might suggest it to her."

"Good woman, Fluvanna!" blurted Gavin. "Try it." He looked at his watch, and nodding in dismissal to Hugh, rushed for the door.

"The Tree That Came Alive"

By FLOYD GIBBONS
Famous Headline Hunter

PHIL REILLY of New York city has had a flock of adventures since that day forty odd years ago when he left home, a boy of fifteen, to make his way in the world.

He was in East St. Louis on the day in 1886 when the cyclone struck the town. He was a passenger on a train out West that was held up by bandits in good old Western style. He was chased through a patch of woods by a hungry wildcat, and he's been in several explosions, storms at sea and the likes. Once he lived through a South American revolution and he saw plenty of adventuring there. But the biggest adventure he ever had in his life was the day in January, 1903, when he climbed a tree.

Men have climbed trees from time immemorial without thinking anything of it. But when an old-time adventurer like Phil Reilly climbs a tree—well—it's Adventure with a capital A. "This is what you call a LITTLE adventure," Phil writes. "It's a little experience with little things." But boy, oh boy, what a BIG difference those little things made to Phil.

It Was on Old Providence Island.

Phil's yarn deals with Old Providence island, down in the Caribbean sea. Phil says it's about two-hundred and fifty miles north northwest of Colon in the Canal Zone, and a hundred and twenty miles off the east coast of Nicaragua. It belongs to the Republic of Colombia, and was once the headquarters of pirates and buccaneers under the leadership of Henry Morgan. "Many people believe," says Phil, "that there is a private treasure still hidden on that island, but I lived there over a year and never discovered any gold or jewels."

But it was while Phil lived there that he discovered "The Tree That Came Alive."

On Old Providence island is a mountain called Bowden Peak that few of the inhabitants have ever climbed. People said the top was almost inaccessible because of the thick brush and tropical vegetation that grew on its slopes. At least that's what they told Phil, and telling an Irishman he can't do something is one sure way to get him to try it. Phil's answer was, "The H— ye say," and then he was telling the world he was going to climb that mountain.

Hard Climb Up the Mountain.

On top of the mountain stood the tree—an old dead one, visible all over the landscape. Phil said when he got up there he'd tie a signal flag to that tree, just to show he got up there.

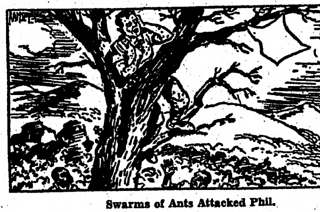
He started early one morning, accompanied by two native boys. All of them carried machetes to cut the brush, and Phil had a three-foot square canvas for a flag. They cut through a swamp, and then started up the mountainside. About six-hundred feet up, the brush was so thick that they had to crawl on their hands and knees. And the farther they went the thicker the brush became. It was late in the afternoon when they reached the summit, their clothes torn and their bodies scratched by thorns and brambles. Then Phil started to climb that tree.



Swarms of Ants Attacked Phil.

On the way up, Phil noticed that the tree was hollow—honeycombed with small holes. He didn't realize then that they were the holes of red ants—tropical red ants—the little stinging, biting devils of a variety unknown to us up here in the North. Phil didn't notice them on the way up. He got to the top and tied his flag to the upper branches of the tree. But on the way down—that was a different story.

Attacked by a Myriad of Ants.

Says Phil: "I must have disturbed those ants in the middle of their siesta. They came swarming out of their nests by the thousand. I wore only a pair of torn cotton trousers, a shirt and a pair of shoes. They got into my shoes first—then up the legs of my trousers and inside my shirt.

"I made the mistake of stopping now and then to brush them off. I should have climbed down out of that tree while I still had the chance. They began crawling up through my collar. In a minute my face, hands and neck were covered with the stinging, biting creatures. They got into my nostrils. They got into my eyes. And oh how they could bite. I had to shut my eyes tightly to keep them from stinging my eyeballs."

And there Phil was in the worst predicament of all his life. I've heard of armies of ants that have eaten up African water buffaloes inside of a few hours—and Phil was being eaten in the same way. And what could he do about it? He was high up in a tree, his eyes tight shut. He couldn't get down blind—and if he opened his eyes, he'd be blinded and no mistake—by those stinging ants.

He Had to Make a Long Drop.

Says Phil: "I stuck it out until it was impossible to stand the torture any longer. I was still twenty feet up in that tree, but I knew I couldn't stay there. I'd have to make the drop, long one though it was. I called down to the native boys—told them to try and catch me as I fell. Then I let go."

Down Phil went. The native boys tried to catch him, but they weren't very successful. All three of them landed together in a heap, in a bunch of rocks at the bottom of the tree.

Phil got up bruised and shaken. Both his ankles were sprained. And on top of that it took him half an hour to rid his body and clothing of the ants—ferocious little demons that were still biting, and kept right on biting to the last.

It was dusk when they started down the mountain again. Darkness fell while they were still fighting their way back through the tangled brush. Halfway down they were met by a number of natives who had come out to search for them when they didn't return. By the time they all got home it was nearly midnight.

"I was laid up for a few days after I got back," Phil says, but my signal flag was waving in the breeze on top of that old dead tree."

And with those ants up there on guard, Phil, I'll bet it still is.

Home Hubby Chooses

Although it is both a written and an unwritten law that a wife is to live in the home which her husband provides for her, the courts of several states have upheld many women who, for petty reasons, have refused to do it. Not long ago, says Collier's Weekly, one court ruled that a woman did not have to live in her husband's house because it was located near the home of his parents

Semolina

Hard grains of wheat left in the bolting cloth when the fine flour has passed through its meshes are called semolina. It is also sometimes manufactured by millers. Certain hard, large-grained wheats growing in Southern Europe produce the best semolina, which is used for thickening soups, for macaroni, for a French bread, as an addition to Italian polenta and is employed in puddings.

Classifying Borrowers

CHARLES LAMB, tired of lending his books, threatened to chain Wordsworth's poems to his shelves, adding: "For of those who borrow, some read slow; some mean to read, but don't read; and some neither read nor mean to read, but borrow, to leave you an opinion of their sagacity. I must do my money-borrowing friends the justice to say that there is nothing of this caprice or wantonness of alienation in them. When they borrow my money they never fail to make use of it."

Cheese Toast

Butter nicely brown toast. Slice over it hard-boiled eggs, boiled at least ten minutes. Pour over this cheese sauce and serve very hot.

Make the cheese sauce by putting 1 tablespoonful of butter in a pan; add 1 tablespoonful of flour, then 1 cupful of milk, pepper and salt. Beat well and add 1 cupful grated American cheese.

Owl Dumb, But Useful

The owl's reputation for great wisdom is quite unmerited. Scientists have known for a long time that the owl is one of the "dumbest" of all things in feathers; though a recent announcement of that commonplace fact got considerable press notice. But though he isn't wise, Old Hooty is nevertheless very useful. He feeds mostly on mice and other small rodents, and helps to keep their numbers below the proportions of an absolute pest.—Science Service.

Steps in Life

Think well over your important steps in life; and, having made up your mind, never look behind.—Thomas Hughes.

Constipated 30 Years

"For thirty years I had stubborn constipation. Sometimes I did not go for four or five days. I also had awful gas bloating, headaches and pains in the back. Adlerika helped right away. Now I eat sausage, bananas, pie, anything I want and never felt better. I sleep soundly all night and enjoy life."—Mrs. Mabel Schott.

If you are suffering from constipation, sleeplessness, sour stomach, and gas bloating, there is quick relief for you in Adlerika. Many report action in thirty minutes after taking just one dose. Adlerika gives complete action, cleaning your bowel tract where ordinary laxatives do not even reach.

Dr. H. L. Shoub, New York, reports: "In addition to intestinal cleansing, Adlerika checks the growth of intestinal bacteria and colon bacilli."

Give your bowels a real cleansing with Adlerika and see how good you feel. Just one spoonful relieves GAS and stubborn constipation. At all Leading Druggists.

HELP KIDNEYS
To Get Rid of Acid and Poisonous Waste

Your kidneys help to keep you well by constantly filtering waste matter from the blood. If your kidneys get functionally disordered and fail to remove excess impurities, there may be poisoning of the whole system and body-wide distress.

Burning, scanty or too frequent urination may be a warning of some kidney or bladder disturbance.

You may suffer nagging backache, persistent headache, attacks of dizziness, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes—feel weak, nervous, all played out.

In such cases it is better to rely on a medicine that has won country-wide acclaim than on something less favorably known. Use Doan's Pills. A multitude of grateful people recommend Doan's. Ask your neighbor!

SENTIMENT STRONG FOR STATE DISPENSARY

Sentiment is strengthening for the State Dispensary proposal that is, Not for the Bill as Drawn, but more complete? Labor is now coming to the suport of the dispensary in great shape, while employers are begining to bestir themselves, and as we predicted, some time ago, the dispensary proposal is coming towards the center of the stage, and will soon shunt all other proposed legislation unto the sidelines.

Sentiment is crystalizing very rapidly. Listening to people from all walks of life, and of various political parties, it is evident that Governor Benson will have the pleasure of seeing his measures taking in a bigger field then he had hoped would be possible.

Listening to people as they talk freely on the State Dispensary proposal it is almost amusing to hear their sentiments. And it is not the sentiment of temperance people, but pople who take a drink. They see the sinister hand of the liquor interests making plans to control the State and local government, looking towards a financial empire built upon the crumbling morals of the people of the State and Nation.

"The liquor interests must be stopped now because if they are given two years more they will have amassed to huge profits that they will be too powerful to reach." These are the sentiments a person hears if one is willing to be a good listener.

But who will organize the "PEOPLES LOBBY' for this bill. It appears that the temperance organizations are not going to make use of their opportunity. They still talk about prohibition.

As one who holds a wholesome hatred for the liquor traffic, and who is a total abstainer, it is probably only fair to say that our views have changed a great deal regarding absolute prohibition. The one who would observe Prohibition laws do not need them, while those who do not believe in prohibition would observe the law anyway.

But the temperance people must find common ground with those who are interested in common decency. They must join hands with them on common grounds. If we decide to be too exclusive, then the forces that should unite will find themselves hopelessly divided.

Such sentiments would be playing into the hands of the liquor interests. If they can keep the people who ar interested in common decency divided, then they will rule the roost.

It is probable that a separate organization will have to be started in order to unite the people on the state dispensary proposal. The Anti-Saloon League does not enjoy the confidence of the people, while it is possible that the Minnesota Temperance movement (another organization) will not want to go out as exponents of the Dispensary.

We do not say the Anti-Saloon League would want to go out for the State Dispensary, but if they did they would not enjoy the confidence of the majority of the people.

As one of the folks who would like to see the liquor traffic in shackles we would not be willing to follow the leadership of the Anti-Saloon League, even though they have some of the most sincere peopl on their staff, many of whom we have great confidence in. The connections of this organization in the past is such a person is almost forced to feel that they are too much interested in partisan politics.

But back to the dispensary. Everyone admits that the liquor traffic is running wild. Shall we stop it before it gets further or shall we divide and let it continue to run wild? Personally, the writer will push as hard as is possible for State monopoly of the liquor traffic.

Some temperance people cry out against the State going into the liquor business. Well they better disillusion themselves and come to their senses. As far as revenue is concerned they are in the business now. Why be technical, why stand in our own light?

The State Dispensary bill will be changed a great deal in committee, before it really gets to the floor for discussion. And that is as it should be. If all the shaping of the bill should be made by amendments it would likely be no good when, and if, it passed.

Revenue from a State monopoly of the Liquor traffic should be handled somewhat on the basis of the Gas Tax, with a fund set aside for education as to the evils of excessive use of intoxicating liquors, both in the press, from the platform and in the schools. Moderation would soon become the rule, then, in place of excess.

MOTOR CARRIERS IS GROWING INDUSTRY

St. Paul, February 16—That transportation by motor carriers is a growing industry in Minnesota is proven by statistics given out by Hjalmar Petersen, Charles Munn, and Harold R. Atwood, members of the Minnesota Railroad and Warehouse Commission.

In 1936, accordng to the Commission, there were 3535 trucks under permit in the state, an increase of 180 over 1935. Most of these trucks are operated by contract carriers, who haul for a limited number of patrons.

At the present time there are fifty-seven companies that operate as common carriers, with permits from the Railroad and Warehouse Commission to do intrastate hauling.

Fifty-four companies operating as common carriers in Minnesota do a purely interstate business, and are licensed by the Interstate Commrc Commission, though many of them are Minnesota concerns. Some of the 57 intrastate common carriers also do an interstate business and hold permits from the Federal as well as the State Government.

The intrastate and interstate common carriers operate 760 trucks which is a slight increase since 1935.

In 1936 there were 35 bus companies using the highways of Minnesota, practically all of them crossing the state line into adjacent states. They make use of 341 busses, which is a much larger number than was operated in 1935, when there were 25 different companies doing both an interstate and intrastate business.

The regulation of motor carriers has become a very important part of the Commission's duties. They conduct approximately 150 public hearings each year on applications for permits from new companies and on complaints against carriers accused of violating their permits.

Never since the Commission became an elective body 36 years ago has its membership been so new as at present, the Commissioners having all taken office sincee January 1, 1935. Hjalmar Petersen, former Governor, is Chairman. He is a former newspaper man of Askov Minnesota, a former Representative in the State Legislature, and, being Lieutenant-Governor when Floyd B. Olson died, became the 23rd Governor of Minnesota.

Charles Munn, of Osseo, Minnesota, who still lives on the farm where he was born, took his place on the Commission in January, 1935. For eight years he was Representative from Northern Hennepin County, being Speaker of the House in 1933.

Harold R. Atwood, of Winona, Minnesota, succeeded Knud Wefald as a member of the Commission last November. He was formerly a railroad employe and business man and from 1925 to 1935 represented Winona County in the State Legislature.

Worthy of Your Pride!

MOTHER, between you and me Sis is getting to be a little show-off. Last night when Dick called, there she sat, big as life, right in the middle of things chirping about the new dress you made her: how you used a remnant left over from one of your dresses, and got it finished in one afternoon—she even had Dick feel the material.

Well, Elsie, you can't blame the child's appreciating herself in a new dress. How about ourselves? Didn't you say your jumper was the talk of the Tennis Club meeting yesterday? And haven't I been spending more time before the mirror since I made my new "Stylish Stout" model? I actually feel like a new person in it—imagine me being vain at my age!

Flatters Stout Figure.

Oh, Mother, you're not vain and you're as young as any of us. You just were lucky to find a particularly flattering style for your figure. That soft jabot makes you look lovely and the whole thing is so slenderizing. But only an expert like you could make such a dress.

It isn't being expert, Elsie, it is choosing a pattern that is deftly designed and giving full step-by-step instructions on how to proceed.

Several Blouses.

I'm going to make another blouse for my jumper soon, Mother. I always admired that white pique shirt of Dick's, so I think I'll try it for my blouse, since the pattern is a lot like a man's shirt in design.

The Patterns.

Pattern 1229 comes in sizes 14 to 20; 32 to 42 bust. Size 16 requires 3⅛ yards of 39-inch material for the jumper and 1⅝ yards for the blouse. Pattern 1847 is available in sizes 36 to 52. Size 38 requires 4¾ yards of 39-inch material.

Pattern 1882 is designed for sizes 2 to 10 years. Size 4 years requires 1¾ yards of 39-inch material.

Washington at 25

WHEN George Washington sat for this rare miniature, he was only twenty-five but he was already well on the way toward becoming Virginia's first citizen. His marriage to Martha, the wealthy widow of Daniel Custis, in 1759 and the death of his half brother, Lawrence, made George at twenty-nine perhaps the richest man in Virginia and certainly one of the richest in America. But before that—in his early twenties—he had made his mark as a soldier who could combine reckless courage with thoughtful purpose.

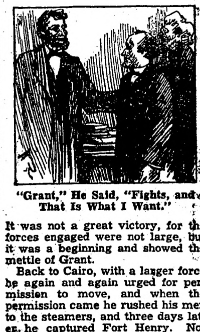
termed "that meddlesome body," the committee on the conduct of war.

The President rapidly reviewed Grant's record since he joined the army. He was at Cairo with a small force. He urgently asked permission to move, saying he would win a victory. The consent was long delayed, but it came at last. Within two or three hours his men were on the steamers, and the brilliant victory of Belmont followed.



"Grant," He Said, "Fights, and That Is What I Want."

It was not a great victory, for the forces engaged were not large, but it was a beginning and showed the mettle of Grant.

Back to Cairo, with a larger force he again and again urged for permission to move, and when the permission came he rushed his men to the steamers, and three days later, he captured Fort Henry. Not delaying an hour he pushed his small force across the country to Fort Donelson. He was not dismayed by the fact that the force in the fort was larger than his own, but immediately locked the doors on that force. When the rest of his men reached him, by a series of brilliant assaults, he captured, not alone the fort, but an army almost equal in number to his own.

At Shiloh, unlike any other general, he remained to fight after his disaster on the first day, he made no effort to get the remains of his army across the river, but at daylight the next morning became the attacking party, winning a victory. He was now at Vicksburg, and complaints of his delay were many. Only that day two senators had urged Lincoln to displace Grant, but he would not do it. "Grant," he said, "fights, and that is what I want." He said Grant had promised him he would capture Vicksburg by the fourth of July, and he intended to give him the opportunity.

The President, with deep earnestness, then declared: "When he captures Vicksburg, I will find some way to boost him over the heads of all others, and give him command of all the armies. With Grant in command, by Jinks!" (his favorite expletive) "the armies will move and move to some purpose. He fights."

There was at least one sleepy head in school on Monday, namely Roy Moline. Perhaps there were others too.

According to the Freshmen reporter, the freshie class this year is brighter than those who were freshies last year. The Sophomores this year do not agree.

Many Garments Are Made

A total of 424 garments was made for needy persons on direct relief of Marshall county this past month by local women employed on WPA sewing projects.

This production figure was released yesterday by Victor Christgau, state WPA administrator. The work is directed locally by Beatrice E. Martens, women's director, in the office of J. B. Kovarik, district director, located at Detroit Lakes.

Garments made for the needy of the county included: 142 items of infants' wear, 49 items of girls' wear, 117 items of womens wear, 60 items of boys' wear and 55 miscellaneous articles.

WPA sewing gave employment to 26 women in the county last month. There are 98 sewing projects in operation in Minnesota. Considered one of the most serviceable women's projects of the WPA, they are giving much needed employment to 3882 women, the bread-winners of their families. These women, who otherwise would be on direct relief, are constructing well made garments which are distributed to other relief clients through the local Surplus Commodity offices.

New Fruit Project Announced

Because of the great interest shown in fruit growing, a new 4-H club project is being introduced this coming spring by which 4-H club boys and girls may choose to grow any number of approved fruits, announces T. A. Erickson, state club leader University Farm, St Paul.

The new project is open to any boy or girl between the ages of 10 and 20. Varities of fruits raised must be among those approved by the Minnesota Horticultural society. Besides the actual work of planting, caring for and producing the fruit, the project members will be required to keep records of costs and cultural practices used, write narrative reports on how they grew their fruits or orchards, make diagrams of their fruit gardens or orchards, and exhibit their narrative reports, records and plan of project at the county fairs.

The Minnesota Fruit Growers association will make a number of awards possible in the form of high class nursery stock of proven varieties, and a year's subscription to the Minnesota Fruit Growers to one club member in each of 50 counties. The state champion fruit grower will be awarded a trip to the National Club Congress in Chicago.

A number of units have been set up in the new project from which the 4-H club boy or girl may choose a program. The minimum requirements in these units are: Unit A - 150 June-bearing strawbeary plants, B - 100 everbearing strawberries, C - 50 red raspberries, D - 6 cherry-plums, E - 6 apple trees, F - 6 plum trees, G - 19 grape vines, H (a short-time combination program) - 25 everbearing strawberries, 55 June-bearing strawberries, 15 raspberries, 2 rhubarb plants and 2 grapes, Unit 1 (a long-time program) - 2 apple trees, 3 plum, 2 grapes, and 2 rhubarb plants, Unit J (a combined program) - 25 strawberries, 25 raspberries, 3 cherry-plums, and 5 grapes.

To Close Mud Lake Cases

Several Mud Lake farmers and land owners were over to Warren on Tuesday conferring with their attorneys as to when to make settlement for their lands out in the proposed game area.

According to reports the State has raised the price on some of the parcels of land as high as 100 per cent to those who have held out for more money during the two years this project has been in litigation. From all indications the thing will be cleared up at the next term of court and the whole matter settled for once and for all.

AVOID LOSSES IN GROWING PIGS

—Prepared by American Foundation for Animal Health

Although American farmers have made wonderful progress in developing both fertility and quality of swine there is still an appalling though largely preventable loss among pigs at birth and during the suckling stage.

Poor selection of breeding stock and failure to supply proper rations to sows before farrowing time accounts for a high percentage of still-born litters.

Contagious abortion (Bang's disease) and the annual outbreaks of swine flu among brood sows, are two other prolific sources of loss.

The best insurance against future trouble among suckling pigs is to have them farrowed in clean, well ventilated and suitably disinfected quarters.

Scrubbing sows with a stiff brush soaked in a soapy antiseptic solution just before farrowing time is advised.

Just after birth the navel stump of pigs should be disinfected to prevent the common crippling losses from so-called joint ill and suckling pneumonia.

Nutritional anemia or blood deficiency is a common and fatal trouble among pigs that are farrowed indoors during early spring months.

It can be prevented by proper handling and medicinal treatment.

A few weeks after farrowing, the pigs should be moved to clean ground, so they will avoid picking up the "yard diseases" harbored in old yards and buildings. This "McLean System" requires rotating the hog lot, just as a farmer rotates his corn ground, and is one of the best steps that can be taken to insure a healthy herd of swine.

Two or three weeks after weaning, the pigs should be vaccinated against hog cholera by a veterinarian. Proper immunization at this age takes less serum and virus, and will last through the lifetime of the animal. The farmer should be sure, however, to have the veterinarian check all pigs to determine their state of health before vaccination; otherwise serious losses may occur.

Many fine pigs are lost at castration and ringing time, because of lockjaw or tetanus. Such losses can be prevented by boiling the castration knife, keeping the hands clean, and by disinfecting the surgical wounds. Pigs should also be kept out of mudholes and wallows for a few days after castration or ringing.

Pungency and wateriness are two accusations often leveled against the turnip. The latter may be overcome by careful draining, the former by the use of a little butter. Don't Irritate Gas Bloating
If you want to really GET RID OF GAS and terrible bloating, don't expect to do it by just doctoring your stomach with harsh, irritating alkalies and "gas tablets." Most GAS is lodged in the stomach and upper intestine and is due to old poisonous matter in the constipated bowels that are loaded with ill-causing bacteria.
If your constipation is of long standing, enormous quantities of dangerous bacteria accumulate. Then your digestion is upset. GAS often presses heart and lungs, making life miserable.
You can't eat or sleep. Your head aches. Your back aches. Your complexion is sallow and pimply. Your breath is foul. You are a sick, grouchy, wretched, unhappy person. YOUR SYSTEM IS POISONED.
Thousands of sufferers have found in Adlerika the quick, scientific way to rid their systems of harmful bacteria. Adlerika rids you of gas and cleans foul poisons out of BOTH upper and lower bowels. Give your bowels a REAL cleansing with Adlerika. Get rid of GAS. Adlerika does not gripe—is not habit forming. At all Leading Druggists.

First Stirrings of Spring

THE chic young miss above, center, says, "I make my own clothes. I learned sewing from Mother first, got a touch of it in school, and a real exposure in 4-H activities. I choose this dress for Spring because it looks like Spring, and because it takes the minimum of time and money. Puff sleeves and princess lines give a formal note if I wish to impress the folks (which I often do) and the peplum jacket is added for frivolous reasons—when I want to feel a bit sophisticated, and it makes a sweet all-occasion dress."

A Practical Choice.

The Lady on the Left says, "I'm practical. Three-Purpose Pattern.

The Girl in the Oval has a faraway look in her eyes. She says it's because she wears glamorous blouses like this one. She cuts her pattern three times—no less—and evolves a blouse in eggshell for her velvet skirt; one in velveteen for her tweeds, and the third in metallic cloth for after-five activities. "The skirt with its simple well directed lines is equally well suited to tweeds for sport, velvet for dress and wool for business," says Madam.

The Patterns.

Pattern 1832 (above left) comes in sizes 32 to 44. Size 34 requires 4¾ yards of 39 inch material.

Pattern 1263 (above center) is designed in sizes 12 to 20 (30 to 40 bust). Size 14 requires 4⅜ yards of 39 inch material for the dress and 2¼ yards for the jacket—to line it requires 2¼ yards of 35 inch material.

Pattern 1958 (above right) is available in sizes 14 to 20 (32 to 46 bust). Size 16 requires 2⅝ yards for the blouse in 39 inch material and 2 yards of 54 inch material for the skirt.

F. W. Magneson, GRYGLA farmer, has a new invention which may prove a boon to agriculture. Known as a "wincharger", the machine utilizes air currents for the development of electrical power.

Speaking before a CROOKSTON audience, Senator Gerald Nye of North Dakota flayed popular beliefs that war acts as a boon to agriculture. "The effect is exactly opopsite," the solon stated.

Margaret (Peggy) Wolfe, daughter of the publisher of the DEER RIVER News and U. of M. co-ed, plus Ray Bjorck, captain of the university's hockey team, will be seeing the preacher soon.

HOW OLD IS ADOLPH?

BRAINERD—The birthday record of the O. J. Risness family sounds like an arithmetic problem. Recently Lorraine, 15-year-old daughter, celebrated her birthday on the same day that her brother, Leonard, attained the age of 30. Late in January, "Pa" passed the 60 mark, just twice the age of his son and four times the age of his daughter.

Apparently irked at the prospects of becoming units on a dinner menu, two market bound steers smashed their way out of a stock truck near WINNEBAGO, dashed into an automobile, demolished the machine.

ST. CLOUD takes rank as the first city in the United States to carry out civilian fingerprinting of all school children. The prints, to be filed in Washington, will enable authorities to identify victims of accidents and disasters.

That clucking you hear is the victory cry of the new state egg laying champion. At EFFIE Emil Rylander's hen left in her nest a sample measuring nine inches around lengthwise, seven and a half inches around the middle.

February 12 meant Lincoln's birthday to most of us, but it meant still more to CASS LAKE. On that day in 1806, General Zebulon Pike visited the old Northwest Trading company's post near the city, gave his name to the lake's famous bay.

The new coaching set-up at the University of Iowa has definite interest for ALEXANDRIA. Pat Boland, first assistant under Irl Tubbs, coached the local high school gridders in 1933 and 1934, following his graduation from the state university.

Attending the annual reunion of survivors of the Lusitania disaster recently was Elmer Dahlstrom of DELAVAN. The British liner, torpedoed off the coast of Ireland by a German submarine in 1915, went to the bottom with a total of 1,198 lives.

To aid farmers of the community in their work and to serve as an idea exchange, COOK has established an agricultural clinic, with meetings held each week in the local high school. Roy Nelson, St. Louis county dairy specialists, is leading discussions.

Snow storms bring strange mixups. Blocked by a derailed plow engine, Soo passenger 110, scheduled to leave DETROIT LAKES at 1 a. m., was forced to back into the city from Vergas, failed to get out until 11 a. m. And, at that, the train had to leave via the Northern Pacific tracks!

TWIN CITY TWISTS

In winning the Minneapolis high school basketball championship, Edison's Wizards set an all-time high scoring mark.

Two dozen valuable purebred dairy cattle were burned to death when flames destroyed the large Blodgett-Guernsey dairy farm near Lake Minnetonka.

William Bloedell, former University of Minnesota football manager, received a delayed 1 to 15 year sentence for the hit-run killing of a Luverne school teacher last Labor Day.

Hugh, on his way out, planned that he would have his mother invite Ellen for dinner very soon. Or he would issue the invitation, call up and coax her a bit if she seemed unwilling. Not tonight—he had to work late tonight. And tomorrow Mother had invited the John Renshaws for dinner, and the next night he had to go to the Wellers' . . . well, some time soon! Perhaps next week.

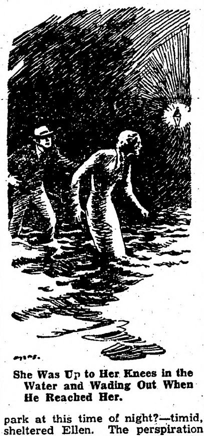
But the Renshaws could not come the next night and Fluvanna went to a concert with Margery and Will. Hugh read the paper, looked at a trade journal, and at nine o'clock, feeling restless, decided on a long ramble. He took Rowdy, Kezia's dog, with him, a wire-haired terrier, which she could not keep in the apartment.

Hugh circled the boulevard and the park twice, a walk of two or three miles, drawing in deep breaths of the early March air which was keen and cold, yet with a difference.

He walked with a swinging step, submerged in his own reflections. Rowdy investigated lawns where lighted windows drained away into the shrubbery, then returned to him. Hugh did not know when he became conscious that a woman was walking half a block ahead of him. She must have turned out unnoticed from a side street. She walked rapidly, for it was a lonely place for a woman to be, the dark woods on her right, and on her left the houses set far back from the street. Young, slight, and faintly familiar.

Suddenly she turned abruptly to her right and plunged into the wood. She walked swiftly and without uncertainty until she disappeared.

Hugh stood still. He had recognized her by a forward movement of her shoulders—or thought he had. Why was she going into the park at this time of night?—timid, sheltered Ellen. The perspiration broke out on his forehead as he remembered the small artificial lake . . .



She Was Up to Her Knees in the Water and Wading Out When He Reached Her.

She was up to her knees in the water and wading out when he reached her.

He lifted her in his arms and carried her to a seat near the bank.

She looked in his face dazedly. "It's Hugh? . . . Hugh?" Then in a low murmur: "Why did you come?"

"Fate sent me, Ellen," he answered simply. He drew her head to his shoulder. "Because you were never meant to do that thing."

She gave a long sighing breath that was more poignant than any sob, it held so much of tears unshed, of misery. "Hugh," she whispered, "it aches so here." She laid her hand on her heart.

"I know."

A pause, then her voice again on that tremulous, respiratory note: "Yes, you know." She drooped against him shivering.

Suddenly she sat up. The water dripped from her sodden clothes.

She faced him, her wistful blue eyes startled and examining. She shook her head. "You are braver than I—stronger. I can't—go on."

She began to cry, shuddering dry sobs, that licked his heart like flaming faggots. He drew her to her feet. "Let us walk. No good sitting here in wet clothes after that ducking. We'll walk very fast—see, like this."

He led her out of the woods, unresisting.

"Can you run? . . . Come, Ellen, run with me as far as the next corner."

They ran for a long block, then slowed down to a walk.

"Tell you what we'll do. You come over to my house and get off your wet clothes, put on something of Mother's. I'll fix you a nice hot drink—then you'll raid the box—get us a lunch! We'll have a nice clubby evening—come!"

She put her hand over her eyes. "Whatever you say—I'm so bewildered."

His mother was not home when they arrived. He took her directly upstairs, turned on the hot water in the bath. "Get in there, young lady, and be quick about it. "I'll have changed and be pounding at your door in five minutes."

He changed his clothes quickly, then ran down to the telephone and called the Pendletons. Gavin's nervous, irritated voice answered.

"Ellen is here with us."

"Yes, yes," Gavin stuttered.

"She's all right. We'll keep her until tomorrow if you don't mind."

"Wait—wait!"

Gavin had a colloquy with Lizzie, then muttered, "Mother wants you to bring her home."

"If I do I won't answer for the consequences!" replied Hugh.

There was a pause while Hugh heard Lizzie's strident voice in opposition. She evidently wanted to talk to him. "Keep her," said Gavin suddenly. "See you tomorrow."

He foraged for everything he could find in the way of food, cheese and ham, olives, white and rye bread, fruit and cake. When Ellen appeared she shook her head. "All this to eat? . . ."

She nibbled, then began eating. Presently at something he said the dimples came out and she laughed in soft merriment.

Her own laughter startled her, and a puzzled look came over her face. "It's beginning to seem ridiculous—like a joke . . . how could I?"

"Some people think life is a joke."

"Playing tricks—yes?"

"It looks like that sometimes when we have set our hearts on something we don't get. Then we think that there is a malicious Being who enjoys our scrapes, a leering, cruel, practical joker."

"It must be true." Her head drooped, her tone was muffled. "He blocks each exit as you hurry from one to another. He says, laughing horribly: 'Stay in your prison!' . . . it seems that way to me."

"And there's another way to look at it. He may be a great wise Force that foresees more than we can—has a plan for us. He lays on each one the burden of destiny . . . and says: 'Take this, carry it—it is my plan for you. Bear it the best you can; grow under it; and I shall lead you out and beyond.'"

"The burden of destiny," Ellen repeated in a dazed tone, "or a practical joker? . . . Which is right?"

"The one which gives us courage," said Hugh with sudden conviction.

"You believe that?"

"I believe that," he answered in a low voice. In his effort to help Ellen, he had suddenly clarified his own vague gropings—was conscious of the uplift of spirit which accompanies an illumination of thought.

So absorbed were they, that they did not hear Fluvanna enter. She stood at the door in her velvet evening wrap, surveying them with wonder and surprise. "Ellen—Ellen!" Ellen ran to her and hid her face on her shoulder.

"So glad you've come, darling," murmured Fluvanna, caressing her.

"She's going to stay all night—perhaps a week or two," said Hugh.

"Nothing would make me happier—Ellen knows I would like to have her forever."

CHAPTER XIII

Gavin took off his glasses and rubbed the place behind his ear where they had rested, then put them on again and blinked at Hugh.

"Lizzie will raise a fuss," at length came his pronouncement.

"I've not talked to Mother yet, but she is so devoted to Ellen that I think she can be persuaded to go," said Hugh.

Six months in France and Italy would restore Ellen, Hugh had pleaded. His mother would accompany her, he thought. It would be well for his mother to have the change; the family difficulties—he had paused—had been hard on her.

Gavin frowned. "But Lizzie——"

"You mean she'll disapprove? You must make her see how important it is. It means more than I've been telling you, Gavin . . ." He leaned forward and rapidly told him of the incident down by the park lake.

Gavin rose, paced the room, muttering unintelligibly under his breath. He came back. "You go to see her . . . tell her . . . Oh, my God . . . Ellen!" He slumped down in his chair.

Hugh rose. "You want me to talk to Lizzie?"

"Yes, I'll drop around there this afternoon." He did not fear the interview with Lizzie a fractional part as much as her husband did.

Gavin wrung his hand at parting. "I'll pay expenses for both," he blurted.

Lizzie received Hugh in the square expensive ugliness of the Pendleton living-room.

Dwelling on Grievances—

Power of Trouble Is Increased And Distributed by Talking of It

THERE is a curious and very much mistaken idea that by talking of our grievances and our troubles, we decrease their power over us to make us miserable. Instead, by dwelling on them we reinforce their power. We not only do this, but we scatter the seeds of their discontent, as we unburden our hearts, and a whole new crop of disturbing thoughts enters into the minds of those who bear with us during our outpouring of words.

Making Misery.

If the person to whom we speak is near and dear to us, our troubles weigh on them almost as their own. We are unwittingly the cause to them of an added weight of discordant thoughts, and perhaps they may be trying to get the better of their own bothers.

Sympathy Versus Help.

We have only to consider the effect on ourselves of listening to others talk of their worries, misfortunes, and hard luck, to realize the depressing power of such conversation. It is seldom we can do anything to help them. In fact persons who talk of their troubles seldom do it to get helpful suggestions. They are bespeaking sympathy and often are disturbed, hurt or annoyed, when they get advice, even though it be excellent. What is wanted is to hear expressions of understanding of their position as difficult, and to hear their actions considered wise. Is this not really what we, ourselves, hope to hear when we air our troubles?

Trouble Mongers

When we are awakened to the fact that talking of our woes adds to those of the listener without lessening ours, that we are implanting troubles in the minds of others, we surely will try to be more careful about giving vent to the misfortunes by talking about them. Moreover, if we do continue to be trouble mongers, no one will be eager to talk with us.

Winning Out.

If, instead of dwelling on our grievances, we discuss pleasant topics, we are not only giving pleasure to others, but we are actually doing ourselves a kindness as well. We diminish our own depression by rising above our troublous thoughts, thus becoming conquerors in and through our conversation.

Washington's Colonial Home

GEORGE WASHINGTON'S colonial home, Mount Vernon, has not been a residence for many years, nor has it been owned by a member of the Washington family for three quarters of a century, says the Washington Star.

Mrs. Eleanor Washington Howard, daughter of John Augustine Washington, the illustrious Washington's great-grandnephew, was the last private owner of the estate. She first saw the world from the most historic home in America in 1856.

Though General Washington's slaves, numbering more than 150, were freed by his will, his nephew, Bushrod Washington, who inherited Mount Vernon, John Augustine Washington Bushrod's nephew, and his son, John Augustine Washington, Jr., who in turn fell heirs to the estate, were slave owners.

Today, survivors of the last generation of negro folk born in the slave quarters of the old manor are proud that their slave parents served in the ancestral home of the Washingtons. Somehow, they give realism to the farm which George Washington owned and which they helped to care for, as young men. These white - haired men declare there never was any depression at the old farm where the nights were festivals with the singing of "Roll, Jordan, Roll," "Swing Low, Sweet Chariot," and "Steal Away to Jesus."

George Washington, who is said to have been worth several hundred thousand dollars in today's values, had a salary of $25,000 a year during his presidency and added resources brought to him by his marriage with the rich Martha Custis. With such wealth he was able to keep his estate of 8,000 acres in fine condition. This was despite the fact that he was constantly entertaining visitors.

By the time the property was inherited by John Augustine Washington, his nephew, in 1829, the plantation had been reduced to 1,225 acres, only about 100 acres of which were suitable for farming. When his son, John Augustine Washington Jr., came into possession of the estate in 1860, after his mother's death, he realized that such wealth as his great-uncle George had possessed was required to restore Mount Vernon and maintain it in its former splendor.

According to tradition a Miss Ann Pamela Cunningham of South Carolina, who was a Potomac boat passenger about the time when John A. Washington wished to sell Mount Vernon, became so impressed with the tolling of the bell and the historical importance of George Washington's home that she became active in working for the purchase of the estate.

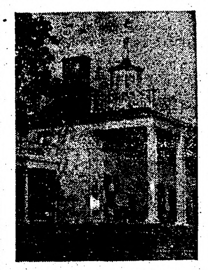
In 1858 the organization she had formed as the Mount Vernen Ladies' association of the Union contracted to buy the mansion and the patriotic appeal of the women and the efforts of Senator Edward Everett of Massachusetts, who toured the country and raised $68,294.59, Mount Vernon was actually purchased in 1860 for a shrine. Then the Washington family left the estate.

With breaking out of the Civil war, Miss Cunningham appealed to the commanders of both armies to preserve Mount Vernon. As both General Scott and General Lee gave orders that no armed man should enter the estate, the shrine was self-protected, the only neutral spot in the United States.

For several years members of at least four families of the Mt. Vernon slaves remained to care for the place, in the employ of the association. Some of the children grew up there and a few of the adults stayed long enough to gain the title of "aunty" or "uncle," which was a typical Southern respect for an aged negro.

For a while after the war visitors to Mount Vernon are said to have practiced such vandalism that they wrote their names over its walls and ceilings. Plaster was removed by those who cut pieces of laths as souvenirs, and even glass was broken in the cupola by those who wished to take away pieces of the famous home.

Today Mount Vernon, a national shrine, is a perfectly preserved plantation with mansion, greenhouse, kitchen, servant's quarters, coach house, smoke house, dairy, spinning house, carpenter's house, gardener's house and plantation office.



Washington's Colonial Home Now a National Shrine.

Perhaps the estate's closest touch with Washington are the beautiful trees in the grounds near the mansion which were planted either by General Washington or by his direction.

If the ancient ashes, beeches, buckeyes, hemlocks, coffee beans, elms, lindens, mulberry and the many venerable holly trees could speak, they would tell much about George Washington's life as a country gentleman.

* * *

America's most famous home, Mount Vernon, underwent not one but two major enlargements during the ownership of the First American who believed apparently, that the first duty of an American citizen to his family was to provide a comfortable home, according to a writer in the Washington Post.

When first built, about 1743, the Virginia home was an unpretentious plantation house of one and one-half stories, comprising the central section of the present mansion.

Just before his marriage to Martha Custis in 1759, Washington "renovized" the dwelling into a house of two and one-half stories by adding one complete story, but did not increase the floor area.

Marshall County Board Holds Regular Monthly Meeting

The Board of County Commissioners met in regular session at the courthouse Tuesday of last week to transact routine business

Bids were opened for the Diesel Auto patrol. Bids were submitted by concerns: J. L. Adams Co., Austin Cestern Road Machinery Co., Borchert-Ingersoll, Inc., Motor Power and Equipment Co., Thorman W. Rosholt Co,, Oscar Schenkey and Wm. H Ziegler, Inc. After a discussion the board decided that the bid of Wm. H. Zeigler, Inc. of Minneapolis was the best bid. The equipment purchased is a number 11 Caterpillar Diesel auto patrol and includes a Shawnee grader and scarifier. The price of this outfit is $5052.00. The bid offered $80.00 for the equipment a grader on a trade in. The balance of the money is to be paid in 18 installments.

The board also decided on a place for additional depositories for county funds. The proposal of the Northern State Bank of Thief River Falls was deemed the best, and a resolution was passed to that effect. This will aid people living in the eastern part of Marshall county, as they can now cash their checks and warrants at this place without additional charge.

Our electric system must be designed to carry the maximum load which occurs during the winter months. This load drops off sharply in the spring due to changing seasons with the result that we have considerable excess capacity in plants and lines in the period from March 16th to July 15th inc. Therefore, during these four months we propose to pass on to our customers the use of this excess capacity, by selling half of the electric energy used in excess of the Kilowatt Hours consumed during the corresponding month in 1936, at 2c per Kilowatt Hour. Each month's consumption of the four months period in 1937, will be compared with the corresponding month in 1936 to determine the number of Kilowatt Hours to be charged for at 2c.

EXAMPLE:
If in March, 1936, you consumed 30 Kilowatt Hours and in March, 1937 your consumption amounts to 50 Kilowatt Hours, Ten (10) Kilowatt Hours, or one-half of the increase, will be charged for at 2c per Kilowatt Hour.

This new Low Rate Shall Apply, During These Four Months, to Residence, Rural and Commercial Light and Power Customers.

High School

Editor-in-Chief:Beatrice Larson
Freshmen reporter: Audrey Krogen.
Sophomore: Opal Werner
Junior: Beatrice Larson

The American History Class took a test on the Civil War on Tuesday.

The Freshmen don't seem very enthusiastic about the pantomimes and dramatizations taken from "Ivanhoe".

We wonder why Francis wouldn't kiss Lyla's hand during the unmasking of "Ivanhoe". It isn't bashfulness is it Francis?

Just for pastime the upperclassmen surveyed the Frosh to discover their characteristics. What did they find. Aves seems to take a particular fancy to blushing, Francis can certainly produce innocent looks and Phyllis keeps on studying. Don enjoys cranking the Model A and Lyla, well, I guess it's just plain Adrian with her. Howard is still collecting rings and Audrey still can't seem to remember her General Science assignment. Rosella has no habits although she does like to keep Francis in good spirits, and Adeline just loves her "specks". And Milton, well— oh, dear, he has just too many antics to even mention!

Mr. Nybakken (In Gen. Science) What is your idea of a balanced ration?
Milton - Peas on a knife.

Did you ever know what a fine companion a book is, especially a bank book?

Maybe the G. R's. shouldn't think our needlework is so fine. After all the most important needle work has been done by a mariner's compass.

The losers in the subscription race are entertaining the winners at a St. Patricks party on Friday evening.

—25—

Lizzie was uncertain in her manner, not knowing whether to be haughty or friendly. She melted under Hugh's friendly agreeableness, and was soon loquacious about her ill-health and the trials she had had to bear with her children. Presently Hugh began talking. She cried out when he related what Ellen had attempted, but when he suggested that the girl go abroad with his mother very soon, a half-scornful smile appeared on her lips. "I'm wondering—wondering!"

"Just what?"

"Do you suppose it was a trick she played to get her own way? She may have seen you—knew you'd follow her, tell us about it!"

"Did Ellen ever play tricks to get her own way?" Hugh asked gravely.

"No-o."

"She couldn't have seen me. I was too far away. I tell you the girl was desperate—half out of her head!"

"Then the place for her is a sanatorium—not Europe!" said Lizzie quickly.

"Do you want that stigma on her?"

Hugh pressed his point eagerly. "And my mother needs this trip. It will do them both so much good. She can leave easily now that Kezia is married—while you, Lizzie——"

"I can take her myself this summer! Gavin will send us if I insist."

An inspiration came to Hugh. "Lizzie, you know you couldn't—you'll never get away. Gavin won't let you out of his sight. He'd mope and grieve, get sick if you were gone longer than a week! . . . If Ellen is to get well, she must have a change of scene for several months."

A flush tinged Lizzie's faded fairness, a gratified light shone in her eyes. She sighed. "Poor Gavin—I'm afraid so! Quiet—never says much, but absolutely devoted. You'd be surprised if you knew how dependent he is on my advice!"

"We all know that."

"And how much his success is due to me!"

Hugh nodded encouragingly. The belief which he helped her build as to Gavin's need of her, was useful to him, and harmless to her. It gave her stubborn mind something to cling to, and might allow Ellen to depart in peace.

That night in the library he tossed some travel pamphlets to Ellen and his mother. "I got these today from an agency. Look them over and tell me which trip you two would like to take."

They looked at him questioningly as they unfolded them.

"There's a good boat sailing in three weeks."

"England — France — Spain — Italy—Germany," murmured Fluvanna. "Shall we take them all, or are we limited to two or three?"

"Greedy! . . . Paris or Florence, since Ellen wants to study."

Ellen's blue eyes flew open, startled. Her lips parted but she did not speak.

"Hugh!" said his mother, warningly.

"Not joking! I've had a busy day planning this. I couldn't speak of it until some details were settled—but they are now. Ellen's father and mother have given their consent. All you two have to decide is where you want to go and the earliest date you can be ready to sail."

Fluvanna looked agitated. "No—no," she began. She stopped at the radiant expression on Ellen's face.

The girl, sitting on a hassock near Hugh, clasped her hands. "Hugh, you're not fooling? . . . they said I could go away?—with Fluvanna? Are you sure there's no mistake? . . . Oh, I can't believe it!"

"There's no mistake," answered Hugh, smiling. "And you, Mother? . . . you said you always wanted to go——?"

"Cousin Fluvanna, think of it! Paris—Florence—the Louvre—the Uffizi Gallery!" Ellen buried her head in the arm of Hugh's chair; he patted her shoulders comfortingly.

Fluvanna's face was a study of struggling emotions. "Leave you?" she whispered.

Hugh nodded slowly, then indicated Ellen, as though her need were greater. His mother was quiet, gazed at the fire.

Ellen raised her head, touched her shining eyes with her handkerchief. "Excuse me . . . I go all weepy with grief or happiness lately . . . but it was happiness this time! . . . Oh, Fluvanna, what wonderful precious times we will have together!

"Pull your chairs up close to mine," said Fluvanna in an oddly hollow voice. "We'll go over the folders together."

The sailing date was set for the seventeenth of April and the days flew by in a hurry of preparation until there was only a week left for Fluvanna to say good-by to dear familiar furnishings, to Margery and her children, to Kezia, to Hugh.

They reached New York the morning of the day they were to sail. It was mild and sunny. They leaned at the rail of the ferry, watching the spires of the city come closer.

"The skyline has soaring aspiration in it," mused Ellen. "Sometimes the tips of buildings are in the clouds—but they always reach up—up! I like this approach to the city so much."

Hugh smiled down at her. Again he had the feeling of a rose opening; the delicate face, the petal texture of her cheeks, had the softness of a flower. She looked like a different person these last few weeks since she knew she was to leave Corinth. Whether Ellen would paint great pictures or not, he did not know, but he knew that as her charm moved him, it would move others. The unconscious seeking for love was in her melodious voice, in the graceful movements of her slight figure. What she sought she would find—perhaps on this trip. He hoped so.

"I recognize the Empire State building," said Fluvanna.

"We'll go to the top of it today," Hugh promised.

Their taxicab went slowly across town, held up by the traffic and the whisking lights. The crowds of people on Forty-second street, moving in restless rhythm, lashed back and forth like the sea. A man, selling roses at the corner of Fifth avenue, extended his bunches ingratiatingly to passers-by. The sun sparkled on the silvery top of the Chrysler building.

"When we come back we will stay here a week," said Ellen. "All of America is here, the west, the north and the south, all fused in a kind of eagerness for achievement. I felt that when I went to school here. Hugh, when we come back, will you come on to meet us?"

Hugh smiled at his mother. "Haven't you heard? I'm coming over to get you when you are ready to come home."

"No!" Ellen leaned forward to look in his face with a sparkle in her glance. "Are you bribing us to cut short our stay?"

Fluvanna rested in the hotel while Hugh and Ellen shopped, then went to a matinee. After late dinner they went down to the boat which was to sail at eleven. Although they were early, knots of people promenaded the decks, gay, laughing groups. Boys scurried down corridors with luggage; the whole ship buzzed with activity. Hugh had secured an outside stateroom with twin beds. Flowers were already there from Kezia and Jerry, fruit from Margery and Will, books, candy, letters, and bon voyage telegrams from friends.

"You're so quiet, Mother," said Hugh, sitting on the arm of her chair. "Tired?"

"No, dear," she replied. She reached for his hand. Hugh, her boy. The moments, the dear moments were flying, and all the while her heart knocked the passionate certitude: "I shall never see him again." Twice lately she had had attacks which she felt might be her last. Two or three months. . . . Only a little while at most, she reasoned. And he wanted this—wanted to help Ellen. He had been better lately in his enthusiasm for helping Ellen. It would work out for the best. Perhaps a dear wish would be fulfilled . . . that old wish . . . Good-by, dear loveliness, dearest and most tender of sons! What are a few weeks of life to give—to help you? The wheel is turning—turning . . . this body will never come back. No harder to say good-by now . . . at least not much harder.

"Ellen and I are going for a stroll around the deck, Mother. We'll be back in a few minutes."

Ellen tied a ribbon about her hair, put on her beaver jacket. Fluvanna watched Hugh hold open the door for her, pass through after Ellen. His tall, easy bulk filled the narrow aperture; the light from the corridor shone on his face. A wave of pride surged up in her, exquisite exultation. "That's my son—my son!" her pale lips murmured.

Ellen and Hugh explored the lounge, the library, and the dining salon, then went for a turn about the deck. They paused and stood at the bow of the boat. The April air was sweet and murmurous. A mystery overhung the deep water of the river.

"The lights on the Jersey shore remind me of necklaces strung in a jeweler's window," said Ellen softly.

"You have pretty thoughts, Ellen."

She tucked back a strand of hair which had escaped from the ribbon. Her white forehead gleamed above the straight, fair brow.

"And you're very pretty, too."

She smiled dreamily.

"Quite lovely in fact."

"I can't think of anyone I'd rather have feel that way about me," she said simply.

"The Menace From the Swamp"

By FLOYD GIBBONS
Famous Headline Hunter

THIS is a yarn that starts with a hurricane, but the hurricane hasn't got much to do with it. It's really a yarn about a bird-dog named Joe, who gave up his life because, bird dog though he was, he wasn't above tackling something beside birds when the life of his mistress was in danger.

Frances McCormick of New York City tells this tale, and I'll bet there's a tear in her eye as she writes it. It starts out in September, 1926, the year of the big hurricane in Florida—the one that hasn't got much to do with our story. Frances and her husband had just arrived in Fort Myers, Fla., and were looking for a place to live. The boom was still going down there, and living quarters were scarce. The best they could find were some rooms over the garage of a wealthy retired physician.

The place was on a river bank, and there was a special reason why the McCormicks took it. The doctor who owned the place loved to hunt. So did Frances' husband. The doctor had dogs, and his kennels were a fine place to keep the McCormicks' dog, Joe. So the McCormicks moved in and settled down for the season.

What Frances Thought Was a Belt.

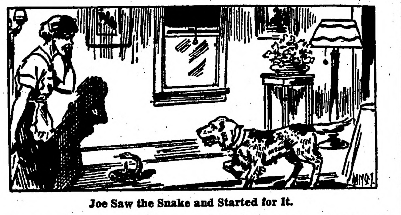
They weren't in their new home long when the hurricane struck. It did a lot of damage—but this isn't a story about the hurricane. All we have to mention is that it blew the roof off the garage building the McCormicks were living in—and it blew in something else, too, but we don't come to that until later in the story.

The McCormicks moved into the doctor's house while the garage was being fixed up. And this is where the dog, Joe, comes into the story.

It was one day shortly after the hurricane, and Frances was in the garage apartment, trying to get things a bit straightened out. The doctor and her husband had gone hunting, but they hadn't taken Joe along with them. Joe was downstairs on the lower floor. Frances went about her business, picking up things and putting them away, until she came upon what she thought was a belt, lying on top of some curtain rods that had been stacked up in one corner of the living room.



Joe Saw the Snake and Started for It.

Frances wasn't thinking much about what she was doing. Her mind was too full of what she had gone through during the storm. She reached out to pick up that belt and—quick as a flash it uncoiled and fell to the floor. And there, lying at her feet was a DIAMOND-BACKED RATTLER!

The Rattler Had Her Cornered.

Frances gave one scream as the snake coiled, ready to strike. She was in the corner with the snake in front of her, and she couldn't move without stepping over the reptile.

She was paralyzed with fright—and maybe it's a good thing she was. If she had made the slightest move, that snake would have struck. Even now it was just waiting for some sort of move before it made that lightning-like thrust with its head and buried its fangs in her.

And then, Frances heard soft feet pad-padding rapidly up the stairs. Joe, the dog, had heard her scream and was coming up double time to see what was the matter. He cleared the head of the stairs with a bound, came leaping into the room. It didn't take Joe more than one glance to size up the situation. He saw the snake and started for it.

At the same time the snake saw Joe. Here, it realized, was something more dangerous than a human. It forgot about Frances and turned its attention to Joe. Head up—its wicked little eyes gleaming, it faced the dog and waited.

It didn't have to wait long. Joe lunged at it. Quick as lightning the rattler's head streaked out. Its ugly little tongue licked out from its mouth, but the fangs missed their mark. Joe jumped aside lightly and the murderous head snapped through the empty air.

Joe Saved Her but Lost His Life.

Again, Joe lunged—and this time the snake was ready for him. This time, Joe couldn't dodge that lashing head. It met him as he started forward—hit him right between the eyes. The fangs stung. Joe fell back. The snake started to glide away, but in an instant, Joe was on top of it. He grabbed it by the neck and broke its back with one quick snap. Then he fell to shaking it. But in between shakes, Frances says, he paused and looked up at his mistress with a pitiful look that seemed to say to her, "Well, I saved YOU anyway."

Joe was still shaking the snake when Frances heard the welcome sounds of her husband and the doctor coming home from their hunting trip. She called to them, and as they ran up the stairs she told them hysterically what had happened. The doctor turned right around and ran back to his own house for the serum which doctors always keep handy in that snake-ridden country. He was back in two minutes—but by that time poor little Joe's head was swollen to almost twice its normal size. He had stopped shaking the snake now. Instead, he was lying on the floor, whimpering like a puppy.

The doctor gave Joe a shot of the serum, but Joe's head kept on swelling. All night long Frances and her husband sat up with the poor dog, nursing him and bathing his head. But in the morning—just at dawn—Joe died.

Frances says that if she'd lost a child, she couldn't have felt worse—and I can believe her. And on the grounds back of the doctor's house, between the garage and the river, there's a white marble slab marking a tiny grave—the grave of Joe the Dog, who gave his life for his mistress.

Battle of 1770

The Battle of Golden Hill was fought January 18, 1770. This was the first conflict of the American Revolution. It occurred in New York City seven weeks before the Boston massacre. British soldiers killed one and wounded three when Sons of Liberty sought to prevent destruction of a liberty pole set up on the outskirts of town at what is Park Row and Broadway, says the Philadelphia Inquirer. A committee of 51 merchants and property owners denounced the Sons of Liberty as irresponsible and unrepresentative radicals, and probably added: "If you don't like this country, why don't you go back where you came from?"

---

First Pennies Coined

The first pennies coined were the large Liberty head type. They were made from 1793 to 1857. A change in both size and design was made in 1856, when pennies were made smaller and the design changed to the flying eagle. These were made usually of copper nickel, and were coined during the years 1856 and 1858. Copper nickel was the material from which pennies were usually made until the year 1863, when bronze began to be used. The design of the pennies was again changed in 1858 to the Indian head type, and coinage of these continued from 1858 to and including 1909. In that year the Lincoln head cents were first minted

Well-Dressed at Little Cost

IT WAS some job, Ladies of The Sewing Circle, to get these three lovelies together to pose for the camera this week. They're under the strict tutelage of Dame Fashion just now, learning the latest lessons on how to be well turned out this Spring without benefit of a private mint. You can understand, then, why the co-ed above, center, sort of jumped the gun, so to speak, and was already on her way when the camera clicked.

A Frock That Clicks.

Speaking of things clicking, don't think that new princess gown she's wearing isn't doing it in a big way. Can't you see from where you're sitting that it is simple to sew besides being a figure-flatterer of the first order? The buttons half way and a neat little collar in contrast are all its lively lines need to complete the perfect balance—chic vs. simplicity. Take a tip from this stylish student and figure it out for yourself in cashmere or velveteen. The style is 1202 and it can be had in sizes 12-20 (30-38). Size 14 requires 4⅜ yards of 39 inch material plus ⅝ yard contrasting.

Go Print for Spring.

The charming young lady above, left, has chosen to model a very dainty and rather picturesque little frock for she believes you'll be interested in this style as a fitting gesture to Springtime. Especially in a modern print, featuring, say, pussycats or deep-sea flowers, would this frock be tempting. The skirt is bias-cut for artistic reasons, and the circles of contrast aid and abet its gracefulness. Let yourself go print then, come Spring. Style 1257 is designed in sizes 12-20 (30-40 bust). Size 14 requires 4⅝ yards of 39 inch material. Eleven yards of bias binding is required for trimming as pictured.

Gay House or Street Frock.

Lest you begin to think every day is Sunday for our starring trio, the trim-looking young lady above, right, wants you to concentrate now on her new gingham gown. Not an ordinary bread-and-butter cotton version, but a beautifully cut, carefully planned dress for general service. The linked button front is enough to give it first place on your Spring sewing list if Sew-Your-Own designers know their clients as well as they think. However, there's more to recommend it: a young becoming collar, a simple yoke-and-sleeve-in-one construction, and a slender action-built skirt. Put them all together they spell CHIC—that little word with a vast meaning. Style 1267 is for sizes 34-48. Size 36 requires 4 yards of 35 inch material plus 1⅛ yards contrasting.

Adlerika acts on BOTH upper and lower bowels and brings out foul matter you would never believe was in your system. This old matter may have poisoned you for months and caused GAS, sour stomach, headache or nervousness.

Dr. H. L. Shoub, New York, reports: "In addition to intestinal cleansing, Adlerika greatly reduces bacteria and colon bacilli."

Mrs. Jas. Filler: "Gas on my stomach was so bad I could not eat or sleep. Even my heart seemed to hurt. The first dose of Adlerika brought me relief. Now I eat as I wish, sleep fine and never felt better."

Watch Your Kidneys!

Help Them Cleanse the Blood of Harmful Body Waste

Your kidneys are constantly filtering waste matter from the blood stream. But kidneys sometimes lag in their work—do not act as Nature intended—fail to remove impurities that, if retained, may poison the system and upset the whole body machinery.

Symptoms may be nagging backache, persistent headache, attacks of dizziness, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes—a feeling of nervous anxiety and loss of pep and strength.

Other signs of kidney or bladder disorder may be burning, scanty or too frequent urination.

There should be no doubt that prompt treatment is wiser than neglect. Use Doan's Pills. Doan's have been winning new friends for more than forty years. They have a nation-wide reputation. Are recommended by grateful people the country over. Ask your neighbor!

Household Questions

Items of Interest to the Housewife

One gallon of coffee will serve 25 medium sized cups. The size that would accompany a dessert after a dinner.

• • •

Horseradish Sauce — This condiment gives the tang to hot roast beef. Mix together two tablespoonfuls of grated horseradish, one tablespoonful of brown sugar, a good pinch of salt, a teaspoonful of made mustard and two tablespoonfuls of vinegar. Lastly, add a quarter-pint of cream, or the yolk of an egg and a little milk.

• • •

Dishes that have contained sugar or greasy articles should be soaked in hot water before washing.

• • •

Rayons should be pressed with a warm, but not hot iron. A hot iron will melt some synthetic materials.

• • •

Don't treat your stockings carelessly. Put them on carefully, and be sure that feet and leg seams are straight. The slightest twist will alter the position of reinforced splicings, and wrinkles always run into holes.

• • •

When blankets are to be washed for the first time they should be soaked over night in cold water and then rinsed. This is to remove the sulphur used in bleaching. After this they should be soused until clear in a lukewarm lather made with boiled soap and water, and then rinsed well in clear water.

• • •

A couple tablespoons of molasses will make beans brown nicely.

• • •

Using Beef Fat — Pour off the fat from the pan in which the roast of beef has been cooked. Put it in a bowl and let cool until it starts to harden. Then beat well with a fork. Afterwards it may be used in place of lard.

• • •

Chocolate stains may be removed by washing in cold water or by soaking in boiling water to which borax or a little glycerin has been added.

• • •

To make lace look new, squeeze in hot, soapy water, then in cold water, and then in milk to stiffen it. Press on the wrong side with a fairly hot iron.

• • •

When cream will not whip, add the white of one egg and thoroughly chill before whipping.

Uncle Phil Says:

Work a Means of Living

Work is what a man turns to when happiness eludes him; only a few foolish ones insist that work is a good substitute for it; even the austere Emerson said: "Work is a means of living; but it is not living."

Carnegie said it was a disgrace to die rich. It all depends on how much one has neglected his opportunities whether it is a disgrace to die poor.

Men wish the return of their youth with the wisdom they have since accumulated.

Which Is Reciprocation

A dog loves his master because his master treats him well; and his master treats him well because the dog loves him.

If you don't want to wreck a man, let him have some belief in his own way of doing things, even when you think there are better ways.

"Sis" always winds papa around her finger; and "Bud" easily sways his mother.

Course of Criminality

An old, old saying which shows the development of the germ of criminality: "First a turnip, then a sheep, next a cow, then the gallows."

Perhaps the human heart is always seeking happiness. Yet the anniversaries it longest remembers are the sad ones.

One who complains that he "never had a chance" probably likes his rut.

Crown of Sympathy

TRUTHFULNESS, frankness, disinterestedness, and faithfulness, are the qualities absolutely essential to friendship and these must be crowned by a sympathy that enters into all the joys, the sorrows, and the interests of the friend that delights in all his upward progress, and when he stumbles or falls, stretches out the helping hand, and is tender and patient even when it condemns.—Mary C. Ware.

She left him to look over the side of the vessel. "They're coming in a stream now—hundreds of them," she said returning.

"I hadn't realized until this moment what a wrench it is to see you both go."

"I'll miss you, too."

A half dozen tourists from St. Louis gathered beside them, oh-ed and ah-ed at the river, pointed to the ferry boats, to the tug which was to take them out, then moved on.

"You'll be lonely, I'm afraid, with your mother gone."

"Oh, don't worry about me. I have my business."

"Yes," she mused, "men seem content if they have that—business."

He heard the deep blast of a whistle, and a good-sized vessel, brightly lighted, went down-stream.

"What was that?"

"Some sort of passenger boat. Too small for an ocean liner."

"Sailing at eleven," repeated Ellen. "It seemed a century away this morning, yet here it is almost upon us. Did you ever have that feeling of waiting for a day or an hour—half afraid it would not come—because it means something definite? Yet it comes and is gone so quickly."

He nodded. Numbly he felt that there was something he wanted to say, that Ellen might say, yet they bandied these inanities back and forth. The moments were passing. He folded his arms on the rail and stared at the gray water, lighted by flickering gold. The consuming passion he had had for Dorrie sprayed its vitriol over his mind. He didn't have anything to say. Nor did she. It was the pale moon, the April night, the romance of the river which stirred magic impulses, whispered to his imagination. It was the loneliness of Ellen and himself which accounted for it—a mood which would pass.

Ellen touched him. "Come, we must go."

Moving through the thronged deck, they went back to the lounge. "I'll stay here a half hour while you talk to your mother. Then it will be time for you to get off."

She came to the stateroom when the bell rang for visitors ashore.

Fluvanna's face, tear-wet, held a soft radiance. Hugh kissed her good-by. He extended his hand to Ellen. Good-by—don't forget to write occasionally."

"I won't forget." Unexpectedly she kissed him with clinging warmth.

Hugh stood stock still; a brief exalted emotion throbbed through him. She shouldn't have done that. She really shouldn't.

He turned to his mother again and said mechanically, "You'll cable when you get there?"

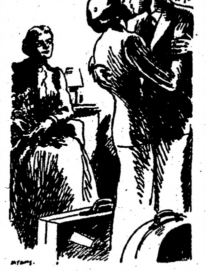
"Darling, you've asked me that four times!" protested Fluvanna. "And I'll write from the boat, and also as soon as we are located in Paris. You'll be deluged with mail! . . . And remember, a letter a week from you! I'll be miserable if I don't have at least a line or two from my boy."

"I'll promise to send three lines."

"Now get off or they'll be pulling up the gangplank." She patted, kissed him again, and pushed him out of the door.

He stood on the pier, his limbs oddly shaky, watching them at the rail, Fluvanna and Ellen. His mother did not look excited; she was gently smiling. Mother was—mystical looking; that was the word! Ellen was trying to say something to him; her lips formed words he could not hear. He shook his head. She tried again. The ship was moving . . . sliding almost imperceptibly. Ellen resorted to gestures. "You," she motioned, "over there!" She meant he would be coming for them. He nodded his head in assent.

Over there . . . But they were leaving him! It came upon him with a pang of desolation. There would be an ocean between. Ellen had kissed him. . . . The revelation was blinding . . . Ellen! Why hadn't he seen it before? Not momentary impulse, but love directing him. Ellen—he—their destinies intermingling. He saw it as clearly as if a directing finger pointed. And she did—she would love him. Her kiss had told him.



Unexpectedly She Kissed Him With Clinging Warmth.

Wait! . . . Stop the ship! They mustn't go!

He struggled through the crowding shoulders, hurried down the pier to be opposite them again. They watched him intently. He formed the words "I love you" to Ellen. She looked puzzled, shook her head, put her hand behind her ear. He tried again. "I love you." Joy broke over her face and he could see the color sweep clear to her brow. She turned to his mother. He could see her say, "He says he loves me!"

Fluvanna nodded at him delightedly. Why, Mother wanted this too!

Ellen's eyes were on him; he could see her mouth tremble. She stretched out her arms. The boat was moving faster. Once more she gestured, this time more timidly. "You—over there." She threw him a kiss.

He watched until the deck became a dark blur of figures as the boat moved away from the lights of the pier, swung into the river. He would follow—no, he couldn't. But he would go in a few weeks. Things were better. Go home; get things in order; perhaps the last of May—June . . . He stumbled along the wharf. At the street a pleading derelict asked him for a dime. He put a dollar in his hand. While he waited for a taxicab, he looked up at the heavens. In the powdered sky, one star shone more brightly than any of the others. Bright star—steadfast and enduring.

THE END

Arctic Ocean Once Covered All America South to New Mexico, to Georgia in East

Shallow arms of the Arctic ocean once extended far southward into both North America and Asia. That was 500,000,000 years ago, according to experts of the Smithsonian institution who have reconstructed the map of that ancient world from the distribution of fossils found in the rock layers.

The Smithsonian scientists have found fossils of Arctic ocean animals in North America and Asia. They conclude that where the fossils are now the ocean must have once been. And so they conclude that narrow bays of the Arctic must have extended once as far south as New Mexico in the west and Georgia in the east. In Asia, they believe that the Arctic extended down into central Siberia, Korea and central China.

In America, they believe that mountains or high plateaus prevented these arms of the Arctic ocean from flowing into either the Atlantic or the Pacific.

The dominant creature of the oceans 500,000,000 years ago was the nautiloid or cephalopod, a mollusk whose nearest living relative is the chambered nautilus. The cephalopod was a creature with tentacles like the octopus. It lived in a shell. As it grew larger, it cemented a new chamber onto the end of its old shell and moved out into it.

The present-day chambered nautilus is small, but the ancient nautiloids sometimes reached lengths to ten feet.

The appearance of the ancient cephalopod seems to have been closer to that of the squid or octopus than to any other living animal, the Smithsonian scientists say.

They believe that it was a free swimmer and dominated the shallow seas in which it lived. The row of chambers composing the shell were of course hollow and helped the animal keep afloat.

A monograph on the cephalopods of Manchuria has been prepared for the Smithsonian institution by Dr. Ruiji Endo, a professor of Mukden college.

"The largest of the Manchurian creatures was perhaps a little more than a foot long," he says. "A few extended their chambers in the form of coils, approaching the practice of the present nautilus."

"The reconstructed picture of both North America and Asia in the Ordovician period," Dr. Charles E. Resser, Smithsonian paleontologist, says, in explaining the significance of Doctor Endo's finds, "indicates that both continents must have been lower and flatter than they are today."

"Both great land masses had been worn smooth during the epoch preceding the Cambrian, the period when some of the earliest traces of life were preserved in the rocks. Consequently only a slight sinking of the land was necessary to send Arctic waters far southward. Such earth movements continually are in progress, but now the continents are so high and their surfaces so irregular that great inundations do not result.

"Yet even today there are somewhat similar situations in the world. Notable is that of the great Ob river of eastern Siberia, one of the three great streams flowing through northern Asia to the Arctic."

Gas, Gas All the Time, Can't Eat or Sleep

"The gas on my stomach was so bad I could not eat or sleep. Even my heart seemed to hurt. A friend suggested Adlerika. The first dose I took brought me relief. Now I eat as I wish, sleep fine and never felt better."—Mrs. Jas. Filler.
Adlerika acts on BOTH upper and lower bowels while ordinary laxatives act on the lower bowel only. Adlerika gives your system a thorough cleansing, bringing out old, poisonous matter that you would not believe was in your system and that has been causing gas pains, sour stomach, nervousness and headaches for months.
Dr. H. L. Shoub, New York, reports: "In addition to intestinal cleansing, Adlerika greatly reduces bacteria and colon bacilli."
Give your bowels a REAL cleansing with Adlerika and see how good you feel. Just one spoonful relieves GAS and constipation. At all Leading Druggists.

Sentinels of Health
Don't Neglect Them!
Nature designed the kidneys to do a marvelous job. Their task is to keep the flowing blood stream free of an excess of toxic impurities. The act of living—life itself—is constantly producing waste matter the kidneys must remove from the blood if good health is to endure.
When the kidneys fail to function as Nature intended, there is retention of waste that may cause body-wide distress. One may suffer nagging backache, persistent headache, attacks of dizziness, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes—feel tired, nervous, all worn out.
Frequent, scanty or burning passages may be further evidence of kidney or bladder disturbance.
The recognized and proper treatment is a diuretic medicine to help the kidneys get rid of excess poisonous body waste. Use Doan's Pills. They have had more than forty years of public approval. Are endorsed the country over. Insist on Doan's. Sold at all drug stores.

Movie • Radio

By VIRGINIA VALE

IF YOU enjoy yourself most at films that make your hair stand on end, your spine tingle, and your hands grow damp in terror, Gaumont-British has brought over just the ideal evening's entertainment for you. It is "The Woman Alone," with Oscar Homolka and Sylvia Sidney.

If you take my advice, you will see it in the afternoon, so you will have a few hours before bedtime in which to recover from the sheer terror it inspires. But by all means see it, even if it does mean loss of sleep for a few days, for it is one of the smoothest and most gripping pictures you will ever have a chance to see.

Speaking of Sylvia Sidney, she and Ann Dvorak are running a neck and neck — or I should say test and test — race for the leading role in Samuel Goldwyn's film of "Dead End." Each girl has made several tests of the big scenes in the play and both are so good, Mr. Goldwyn is having a hard time choosing between them. Hollywood sort of hopes Ann Dvorak will get the role, because Sylvia Sidney has had so many triumphs lately, she really doesn't need another as much as the lovable Ann does.

When Jean Sablon sang on the Rudy Vallee hour recently, all the film scouts were listening. Immediately studio heads telegraphed their New York offices to take a look at him and put him under contract if his appearance was half as romantic as his voice. They reported that he was every studio's dream of a matinee idol, but none have succeeded in getting him under contract yet. Mr. Sablon is twenty-nine years old and has been singing in operettas in Paris ever since he was sixteen.

Everyone who enjoys madcap comedy will be pleased with the forthcoming "Love Is News." Tyrone Power, Don Ameche, and Loretta Young play the leading roles, but there is another member of the cast who may interest you even more. Playing opposite Tyrone Power is a young lady named Carol Tevis who is an old, old friend of yours. Never heard of her? Maybe not under that name, but surely you will recall that you have loved and cherished her for years when I tell you that she used to be the voice of Minnie Mouse. This is not her first appearance before the camera; she played a small part in "Sweepstake Annie."

All Hollywood is rejoicing because W. C. Fields is so far on the road to recovery that he is able to have a few visitors now, walk around the sanitarium grounds, and even think about coming back to Paramount to work. During his illness he became one of the country's leading radio fans. All day and far into the night he was listening, and he thinks that curiosity about the next punch in the Jack Benny-Fred Allen feud helped to keep him alive. His other favorites are Easy Aces and Lum and Abner.

Zasu Pitts has come back from England where she made two pictures, paused in New York a short time and hustled into Hollywood to go to work at RKO. She loved sightseeing in England, particularly as her guide was the mellow-voiced Charles Laughton of innumerable film triumphs, including "Ruggles of Red Gap" in which she appeared. Laughton not only showed her around London, he gave her a pair of exquisite French antique vases for her new home. Incidentally, a radio sponsor is trying to get Zasu to devote all her time to radio programs.

How Many Pennies Your Child's Life?

Don't Try to "Save" on Home Remedies—Ask Your Doctor

There is one point, on which practically all doctors agree. That is: Don't give your child unknown remedies without asking your doctor first.

All mothers know this. But sometimes the instinct to save a few pennies by buying "something just as good" overcomes caution.

When it comes to the widely used children's remedy — "milk of magnesia" — many doctors for over half a century have said "PHILLIPS." For Phillips' Milk of Magnesia is the standard of the world. Safe for children.

Keep this in mind, and say "PHILLIPS' MILK OF MAGNESIA" when you buy. Comes now, also in tablet form. Get the form you prefer. But see that what you get is labeled "Genuine Phillips' Milk of Magnesia." 25¢ for a big box of the tablets at drug stores.

ALSO IN TABLET FORM: Each tiny tablet is the equivalent of a teaspoonful of genuine Phillips' Milk of Magnesia.

Spring—Fashions—Sewing

ARE the robins showing interest in real estate out your way—and have the kiddies been hinting that it's about time to go barefoot—have you been trying to get a little house cleaning done—and have you noticed a few of the town's rabid sportsmen out poking here and there on the fairways? In short, is it Spring out your way? That, of course, brings us to the omnipresent subject of fashions, and this in turn to the ubiquitous topic of Sew-Your-Own.

If you're a devotee of trim lines and real comfort make this new all-occasion dress for yourself (Pattern 1973) in two versions: a silk print in which to greet the bright new season; a cotton one for day in, day out service. There's no daytime occasion too auspicious nor a household task too menial for one or the other of these versions. For completeness, then, and simplicity as well, there's no substitute for this stylish number. It is designed for sizes 36 to 52. Size 38 requires 3⅝ yards of 35 inch material.

And see what the Chic Twins have, two lovely blouses with but a single purpose—to make you look your very veriest. They're combined to make Pattern 1271 the biggest hit of the season. Think of the endless variety these clever bits of fashion will give your wardrobe. Especially now will ensembles be worn, and to have certain success with these one must choose the blouse carefully. Wear the notched lapel model with casual sports outfits and the ruff-collared style with the more tailored suits. Puff sleeves and saucy peplums are particularly intriguing features of both blouses. Either is available for sizes 12 to 20 (30 to 38 bust). Size 14 (top model) requires 2 yards of 39 inch material or 2⅛ yards for the other. Remember, both are included in Pattern 1271.

Pattern 1259 is truly an Ode to Spring—one that's fit for print, too. A bright nosegay, for instance, will be just the thing to promote your charm and grace. The far-reaching collar and grosgrain ribbon tie will indeed become your pretty face. The puff sleeves and smart cuffs fairly snap with chic. Simple to make, delightful to wear, this frock deserves to be called an Ode to Spring. It comes in sizes 12-20 (30 to 40 bust). Size 14 requires 5¼ yards of 39 inch material plus ¾ yard contrasting. The bow requires ⅝ yard ribbon. In full length size 14 requires 6⅛ yards of 39 inch material.

Electric Eel to Be Investigated in His Habitat

Working of His Power Plant Will Be Studied

New York.—What happens to an electric eel when another electric eel hands it a dose of its own medicine?

This is one of the questions being taken to the Brazilian tropics by Dr. Richard T. Cox of the New York university physics department, who has left for an extended research visit in Para, Brazil, near the mouth of the Amazon, a favored haunt of the "shocking" elongated fish whose ability to generate and discharge paralyzing "jolts" of electricity is one of the classic riddles of biophysics.

Among the pieces of apparatus which Dr. Cox is taking with him is one calculated to deliver electrical discharges like those of the eel itself. His plan is to put his eel into contact with the device, "give it the works," and then make a careful scientific record of the fish's reaction. This is something that has never been done in the aquarium studies thus far undertaken in temperate lands.

Will Study Its Power Plant.

Even more intimate studies of the electric eel's internal power plant and its workings are planned by Dr. Cox. He plans to block off various parts of the eel's system of electric organs, either by sectioning nerves or with anesthetics, and thus to make analytic studies which have never been possible under aquarium conditions, where the supply of specimens is so limited that only studies of surface reactions have been possible.

A prime part of Dr. Cox's research apparatus will be the cathode ray oscillograph, a relatively new instrument which has proved a most powerful tool in the hands of physicists and engineers studying the nature and rates of sudden electrical discharges. Modern apparatus of this kind has never been used in electric eel studies, he says.

Why He Goes to the Eels.

One reason why Dr. Cox is going to the tropics where the eels are, instead of having the eels brought to him, is that these peculiar fish do not survive the voyage north at all well, so that it is better economy for him to go where they are plentiful and where he can consequently afford to use up a few without constantly having to keep an anxious eye on a diminishing supply in a tank.

Dr. Cox will have with him his wife, Mrs. Shelby Shackelford Cox, as artist and general assistant, and a biologist, Robert S. Mathews, graduate student at Columbia.

Spectroscope's Eye Useful in Finding Impurities in Iron

Cambridge.—How the powerful eye of the spectroscope is used in industry to analyze metals, particularly in testing steels and alloys for impurities, was explained to the symposium on metals at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology here by Prof. George R. Harrison, director of the institute's spectroscopy laboratory.

Even such small amounts as one part in ten thousand of some metals, such as aluminum or magnesium, will greatly alter the properties of steel, it has been found. Thus the inclusion of one old automobile crank case of the wrong type may spoil tons of steel.

The spectrograph, he explained, constitutes a quick and accurate method of checking steel for such impurities.

X-Rays Aid Study of Poison Sprays

Ithaca, N. Y.—X-rays are being used by Prof. G. F. McLeod of Cornell university to get exact data on how poison sprays containing sulphur behave as they stick to leaves, and what becomes of the sulphur after the marauding insect or caterpillar has bitten out and swallowed some appetizing but lethal green pieces.

The rays used in the photography are of the kind known as Grenz rays; they are like X-rays but have somewhat greater wavelengths, intermediate between X-rays and ultraviolet.

"Keep A-Goin'"—

Persistence in Efforts Likely to Bring About Fulfillment of Ambition

PERHAPS it is my fondness for violets that made me stand and watch him. Anyway, there he was, with a wonderful basket of scented loveliness, tempting the homeward-going throng on a Saturday afternoon.

"Violets, violets, lovely violets. Quarter a bunch. Lovely violets."

Like an unending song, his husky voice cried his wares, and during the ten minutes that I stood near him on the pavement, watching and listening, he kept up his cry.

Unable to resist the temptation, I bought a bunch, and even as he served me, he punctuated the deal with: "Violets, all fresh and lovely."

Persistence Counts.

I remarked, as I waited for my change, that he had a large basket to dispose of.

"Yes," he said, "that's right, gov'nor. But they'll all go. ('Ere you are, sir, lovely violets, all fresh.) Only you 'as to keep a-goin'. Everybody's in a hurry to get 'ome, and if you ain't persistent—(yes, lady, smaller bunches fourpence)—you don't sell 'arf as many. 'Ere you are, sir, your change. Thank you very much. Violets, lovely violets. All fresh!"

I walked away with my purple bunch—and a lesson in my mind. "Keep a-goin'." What a motto! It reminded me of a little jingle that is oft quoted by a rolling-stone friend of mine, who brought it back from the West of Canada, where he first heard it. It goes like this:

If it rains or if it snows,
If it's calm or if it blows,
What'll happen no one knows,
So keep a-goin'.

A well-known athlete once told me that he had won many a second and third prize by simply keeping on. Dogged does it. Even when he realized that he couldn't beat the winner, he set his mind on being in the first three, and got there.

A Motto for Many.

Keep a-goin' is a motto not only for rolling stones and athletes and violet-sellers. It is a motto for housewives who are faced with a tiring washing-day, for families who are faced with no very brilliant outlook for the future, for those who are apt to lie down under the weight of present troubles.

Nothing stands still. Things either get better or worse, and they are far more likely to get better if we persist in our efforts to make them so.

Take heart. This year, England is to crown a new king. This year, too, we may crown some individual ambition with fulfillment. We can do it, I know, if we "keep a-goin'."—Editor of London Answers.

The Modern and American History classes took a test on current world affairs last week.

The Modern History class was studying world progress in the different sciences. When Mr. Nybakken asked how the knowledge of these sciences spread, Lucille answered, "Gossip".

Reports were given on John Marshall and Andrew Jackson in American History class last week by Roy and Bernice.

In their study of the match indurtry, the Ecomomic Geography class was asked what a match was made of. One brilliant student responded, "He would and she would."

Report cards for the first six-weeks period of the second semester were handed out on Wednesday.

BENSON NEEDS SUPPORT

Governor Benson needs some substantial support in order that the legislature, mostly the State Senate, be forced to do the will of the people. But there are some folks in the lower House that needs to get a reminder from the folks back home, and from other sections of the state.

The Governors Tax bill would be of great help to the Farmers, but would mean that large corporations would be paying more of the taxes. And Oh! What a howl from the big daily newspapers because of the proposed increase in the Income tax rates.

During political campaigns these same newspapers carry long editorials about reducing the taxes on farm land, while Republican candidates for office shed crocodile tears about the high taxes the farmers pay. But that is only a smoke screen. It is so much dust in the eyes of the people, attempting to fool them into voting for the agents of special privilege, and against themselves.

The Income Tax would apply only to those who have incomes and would not apply as taxes does on farms, real and personal property which is taxed regardless of whether it produces income or is at a loss. The average farmer and home owner would pay no taxes if taxes were applied on the basis of income.

Then why do the puppets of special privilege howl? It is to create fear in those who have no reason to fear and to throw dust in the eyes of the common folks so that they can not see.

While the 67th legislative district is fortunate enough to have a Senator, (Richard Rice of Alvarado) and three Representatives who support the Governor in his effort to relieve farmers of some of their tax burden it is evident that the influence of the people of this section could help put some respect into the Senators and Representatives who are serving as the agents of "special privilege" by joining in a march on the Capitol and helping to stage a demonstration that will cause these gentry to think of the folks back home and what may happen when they return after the session and when another election rolls around.

The Anti-Saloon League And—

For whom is the anti-saloon league working? Is it for the drys or for the saloon element? What is transpiring makes it look mighty much like they are working for the saloon element. For surely they are no the same side of the fence.

While we have always been against the liquor business and never imbibe, we have always been opposed to the Anti-Saloon League. It is our firm belief that this organization has been a distinct liability to the cause of temperance.

The Anti-Saloon League is out against the Governors Dispensary Bill with everything they have, on the reason that it would put the state into the liquor business. That is a flimsy excuse. It is either the excuse of one who does not recognize the fact that we will not go back to Constitutional Prohibition, or it the excuse of a narrow mind, or the excuse of folks who find that excuse the best behind which to hide some other motive that can not stand the light of day.

A state Dispensary comes the nearest to the solution of the Liquor evil of any of the proposals before the Minnesota Legislature. It does not put the State into the liquor business any more than it is at present, as far as revenue is concerned, because thestate is reaping large revenues from the liquor evil right at the present time.

And have you noticed how the Allies of the Anti-Saloon League, the newspapers like the Minneapolis Journal, Minneapolis Tribune, St. Paul Pioneer Press and St. Paul Dispatch, propagandize against the Governors proposed Dispensary? Well just take note and then look through the columns of these same newspapers and note how much liquor advertising they carry. When you have done that, then sit back and do some thinking for yourself.

Personally we would like to see intoxicating liquors removed as a curse on the human race. For a curse it is. But let us be practical. We have found that it can not be legislated out of existence. It seems that education as to its evils is the sane way. Then why not be practical and adopt the lesser evil, a State Dispensary? Then the profit motive would not be tempting some individual to seek profits by creating appetite for this degrading and murdering liquid.

Governor Benson is sincere. He is perhaps more of a temperance crank than the writer. He wants to remove the liquor business from the field of state politics. He wants to save the people of the state from attempts to create appetite for intoxicants. The liquor business in private hands is one of the most inister influences in American life. To take the profits of this evil out of private hands would be a blessing to the people of the entire state whether they ever imbibe its debasing dregs or not. If anything the people should go farther than the Governor proposes to go, and eliminate profits from the entire field of spirituous intoxicating liquors.

For the sake of common decency, and the sake of posterity, let all of us who can see clearly, rally behind Governor Benson's proposal, and perhaps help better his proposal, and then help put it over, in spite of the Anti-Saloon League and the vendors of intoxicating liquors.

Sincerity Is Much Needed

Sincerity is something that is very much needed in both individual and public life. So often it is heard that such and such a person is not sincere, and that such and such a public official is not sincere.

How invigorating is it not to come in contact with people whom you know are sincere in their convictions, and what a satisfaction is it not to learn to know that some public official is really sincere. Right at this time there seems to be a genuine feeling among the majority of the people for public officials who are really sincere, and who have the Courage of their convictions.

And when we find public officials who are sincere we should show them that they are appreciated, and we should encourage them. Often the sincere person find themselves standing alone, while people who sympathize with them remain quiet and do not offer moral support.

And often the spirit of the sincere person is broken when they find themselves fighting alone. Great people have cried out their despair, and many have given up some great fight which they were in the midst of, and perhaps they have been reviled for giving up by the ones who with-held their moral support.

Then there are the great figures of history. Today we bow in humble tribute to their memory, but when they lived they were reviled, hated and scorned, often by their own friends.

Perhaps it is necessary that these sublime souls be tested by the fire of public scorn, ridicule and often falsehood. Perhaps it tempers them and makes those with the right kind of metal greater, more dutiful and understanding.

The President

To us President Franklin Delano Roosevelt is the greatest man that ever graced the President's Chair, because he has done more for the poor, and those in need of help, than any other President. We admire him, not because he is a Democrat, but because he has compassion in his heart for the poor and for those who toil. Surely no President in the history of our Nation is greater than he.

And yet he is being reviled by the puppets of special privilege for his desire to change the personnel of the Supreme Court and make the Court amendable to the needs of the present day and for the benefit of the future. He is being reviled by those who have evil in their heart and who desire to exploit those who toil.

And the Bar Association voted six to one against the President on the Supreme Court Controversy. That, in our estimation, would show that the President is pursuing the right course. For the majority of the Lawyers have always been on the side of special privilege, and for the system of exploitation creating large corporations for whom they could become puppets.

But thank God there are at least a few sublime souls among the Lawyers who see with the eyes of "Human Welfare." And they are fearless and speak logically and with conviction. Surely these Lawyers are of inestimable assistance to the President and to the people.

And speaking of packing the Supreme Court—"Did you know that Lloyd George packed the House of Lords in England in 1909? And the reason he did was to cause the re-distribution of some of the large fortunes there and save the Country from a Revolution. Yes, there was some fuss by the Aristocracy of England at that time, but had the Aristocracy of England at the time, but he had the ability and courage to push on through and the House of Lords did not veto the doings of the House of Commons.

"Re-distribution of Wealth." That is what the President is endeavoring to accomplish. The great fortunes must not be permitted to continue their plundering of the masses and force those who do the Nations useful work to live in poverty while the few "rot in their ill gotten riches."

Yes, Roosevelt has surely had compassion for the "REAL" people of this great Nation. He wants this great nation to continue, and the only way it can continue is to force the exploiters to divide more reasonably the products of the toilers of the Nation and thereby promote the general good, in order that the people as a whole may enjoy the many good things placed here for the good of all by a gracious Creator.

Rural Electrification

Why not undertake to have Electric lines extended to the several Community Centers? That is a thing that should be undertaken as soon as possible. And it would be for the benefit of everybody. The farmers should have electric lights and power on the farm and as the volume increases the price of current can be reduced to all consumers in the community.

But who should sponsor such undertakings? The Commercial Club could do that very logically. A committee could be created, that truly believes in that principle, and arrange to meet with Farmer groups and talk over such possibilities and arrange for public meetings to create interest in such projects.

The Federal Government has set aside funds for Rural Electrification and every community should take advantage of such funds, in so far as this community has a Municipal plant for the generating of electricity.

Would it not be nice to see our farms electrified? Just think what an improvement it would be and what a great help it would be to the Farmer and his wife and family. And the projects would be self-liquidating, the terms providing for the amortization of the loans by small payments over a period of years.

And these Federal Funds can be the means of building up these communities and creating employment and more industry in our Community. Such possibilities should not be overlooked. It is, however, up to the civic organizations to promote such undertakings. And one thing that should be borne in mind is that the larger the volume the less the cost of generating.

Will the Commercial Club and Farmer Organizations be wide-wake enough to seize this opportunity in place of waiting until others have used up all the funds and decry the fact that the work had not been undertaken? The time to act is NOW!

We Scratched The Cranium

Two weeks ago we called in the several communities west of Minneapolis and on one building we read "BUFFALO HATCHERY." We looked, then rubbed our eyes and looked again. What! Were they hatching Buffalo's? No it was the Chick Hatchery at Buffalo, Minnesota.

A sure sign of spring is when the youngsters commence to play marbles and men stand leisurely on street corners. So spring is surely coming and crows are also making their appearance.

Can We See Ourselves

How would we look to ourselves if we could "just step behind a tree and see ourselves go by." We imagine there might be some corrections that we would resolve to make. To step aside and look at ourself canand should be done.

Plans For The Garden

Seed catalogues are again making their appearances in most homes and plans are being made for the garden of greens and also of flowers. And how good those gardens look that are pictured in Seed Catalogues, and in the imagination.

COMMUNICATION

Editor, Marshall County Star,
Warren, Minnesota.
Dear friend:

In a recent editorial in the St. Paul Dispatch of March 1st, entitled "Iron Ore Policies", they told about that there was two viewpoints at this session of the Legislature toward iron ore taxation. One was the ones who held that there will be nothing but a hole in the ground left after the ore was taken out, and therefore the state should get everything possible from the iron companies while the ore lasts.

The second general approach is of those who are primarily interested in prolonging the life of the industry through encouragement of the use of low grade ore of which there is an almost inexhaustible supply. Then they go on and quote Professor Darrel H. Davis of the University of Minnesota department of geography touched on the problem in a pessimistic vein, indicating a belief that the life of the range is limited to the life of the high grade deposits or about 30 years.

His colleague, Professor Edward W. Davis of the University Mines Experiment Station gave a more optimistic answer, he divided the deposit into three classifications, with the grade ore the raisins in the cake, the high grade alone are good enugh to be shipped direct to the blast furnaces. The rest must be subjected to mechanical treatment to remove the waste and produce a merchantable high grade ore. These efforts have been so successful that from nothing at all in 1907. At present 25 per cent of the ore shipped from the state is manufactured from class 2 material. The labor costs are 10.3 cents per ton on high grade ore for every ton shipped. There are three types of operations to make class 2 ore merchantable, with labor costs respectively of 26.4 cents, 47 cents and 63.7 cents per ton. On class 3 ore the labor costs were 75 cents per ton. Thus the range and the state derive the maximum benefit from the use of low grade rather than high grade ores, because these operations create more employment and bring a larger proportion of the cost of the ore into the state in the form of wages. Moreover, such operations make possible a continuous industry throughout the year instead of a seasonal industry such as mining is, chiefly at present.

This is fine so far but why did the editor not complete the picture and tell us the whole thing. Now since it is cheaper to bring the coal to the iron ore than to ship the ore to where the coal is mined. Why not put up blast furnaces in Minnesota where the iron ore is mined and finish the process and complete the cycle and make the ore into steel, thereby making work for hundred thousands persons and making a better market for the northwest farmer, more sales for the merchants and more happiness for all the people of Minnesota, but that would not build up the industrial east and Wall Street at the cost of the northwest.

The Farmer Labor party of Minnesota has for some time suggested this plan for Minnesota, the most good for all of its people. What is wrong with the idea?

Greeting to my friends everywhere.

Yours for a better Minnesota,
G. A. Sustad.

N. W. School News

On April 1, 1937, Dr. A. A. Dowell will resign his position as Superintendent of the Northwest School and Station to take a professorship in the Division of Agricultural Economics at University Farm, St. Paul. He will be succeeded as Superintendent of the School and Station by Professor Thomas M. McCall, who has been in charge of the horticultural work at Crookston for twenty-five years.

During the ten years Dr. Dowell has been in charge of the Northwest School and Station, student enrollment has increased one-third. Over fifty-seven per cent of the graduates have completed their course work during this period.

Following graduation at the Iowa State College, Dr. Dowell taught there for two years before accepting a position as head of the Animal Husbandry Department at the University of Alberta, Canada. While stationed in Canada, he was appointed to make a study of livestock markets in the British Isles. He joined the Agricultural Extension staff of the University of Minnesota in 1922 and was transferred to Crookston five years later. For ten months during the school year 1933-34, he was granted a leave of absence to direct special studies in livestock marketing for the Bureau of Agricultural Economics at Washington, D. C. Dr. Dowell collaborated with Dr. O. B. Jesness in the publication of a book on "The American Farmer and the Expert Market", in 1934. He is president of the Winter Shows Board of Managers, president of the Red River Valley Livestock Association, president of the Red River Valley Dairymen's Association, and past-president of the Red River Valley Development Association.

Professor McCall came to the Northwest School and Station from the Iowa State College in 1911. He returned to the Iowa State College in 1929-30 for graduate study and was granted the degree of Master of Science. Professor McCall was acting-superintendent during the the Department of Agriculture at time that Dr. Dowell was assisting Washington, D. C. His knowledge of agricultural conditions in the Red River Valley and his keen interest in the work of the School and Station insure a successful administration.

Boy Scout Court Of Honor

The Boy Scout Troop No. 112 of Holt held a Court of Honor in the Nazareth Lutheran church basement on Friday evening, Mar. 19.

Six boys were examined for first class scouting, one for second class and one for special merit in bookbinding. They all received badges.

Mr. DeJong, executive director from Grand Forks, Rev. Cook and Mr. Mayer-Oakes of Thief River Falls were here to assist the local committee in putting the boys thru the tests and award merits.

Mr. DeJong showed a fifty foot movie reel of a wonderful trip he and a small group of scouts had taken last summer up up in the arrowhead country north of Ely on the Iron Range.

After the program the scouts served a delicious lunch. About fifty people were present for the occasion.

---

Spring is here. So they say, for a few crows have already been sighted in this community. We have not seen any yet but someone that we know would not kid us, report seeing many crows.

---

Gullick Swenson, Elvin Erickson, Mrs. Ole Christianson and Delores, and Mr. and Mrs. Lawrence Christianson were entertained at the Hans Stensrud home Sunday.

Committed Suicide Sunday

Johnnie Hoel, who has the past winter been employrd at the Christ Engen farm, committed suicide on Sunday afternoon by shooting himself in the head with a single barrel shot gun.

Mr. and Mrs. Engen had gone to Middle River to spend the day and when they returned and found some of the chores undone they started to investigate the whereabouts of Mr. Hoel. Mr. Engen found him in the hay loft of his barn.

Mr. and Mrs. Skoglund had called at the farm about three o'clock in the afternoon and could not see that there was anything wrong with the man, so he apparently must have committed the act shortly before Engen's returned home about five in the afternoon.

Dr. Blegen, county coroner, and Deputy Sheriff Kays of Warren came here to investigate the shooting and no inquest was held

---

Rev. and Mrs. S. T. Anderson and daughter Rachel, of Grygla, visited at the parsonage on Monday afternoon.

---

Four Deaths Arouse Patrol

Aroused by four deaths and more than 20 injuries to boy and girl bicyclisls in Minnesota in the first ten weeks of 1937, the Minnesota Highway patrol, under the direction of John P. Arnoldy, chief, and with the approval of N. W. Elsberg, state highway commissioner, has ordered immediate organization of juvenile bicycle clubs throughout the state, the Veterans of Foreign Wars co-operating.

It is proposed that clubs be formed for the promotion of safety in every state, under elective leadership and with judges or county attorneys as advisors. Rules and regulations are being prepared in Mr. Arnoldy's office and will be available for free distribution shortly.

The clubs, which would be similiar in many ways to school police patrols, now sponsored by the American Legion, would be expected to adopt a series of so-called "Commandments", some of which call for members to swear not to ride bicycles two on a machine, not to ride two abreast, to stop at all stop signs, give proper signals for turns, etc Violations of these commandments would bring a hearing before each club's own officers with possible impounding of machines by police and sheriffs.

Mrs. G. O. Erickson of Moorhead spent a few days here visiting her brother Nils Fosen. She also attended to matters of business in connection with her land in Mud Lake.

Household Questions

A little salt added to an egg before beating makes it light and easier to beat.

• • •

Cretonne slip covers will retain their color better if washed in bran water.

• • •

Sweet Prunes—A very delicious as well as unusual way of serving prunes for breakfast is to soak them in fruit juices. Whenever a jar of fruit is opened save the juices and put a few prunes in the jar. When they have become swollen they are ready to be eaten.

• • •

To make perfect muffins combine all dry ingredients, then add liquids quickly, stirring but not beating. Do not stir after ingredients are moistened. Fill muffin pans two-thirds full and if mixture looks lumpy it will smooth out during baking.

• • •

Home Made Crackers—Sift together one-fourth a teaspoonful of salt and one cup of pastry flour. With a knife or tips of the fingers work to a dough with water, sweet milk, or thin cream (the last is preferable). Knead slightly —just enough to get into shape—then roll into a very thin sheet, stamp out with cutters, or cut into rectangular pieces with a sharp knife, prick with a fork, and bake a delicate brown.

• • •

Agateware is easily chipped, so don't scrape out food that becomes stuck in it.

• • •

Coddled Apples—Two cups boiling water, one or two cups sugar, eight apples. Make a syrup of sugar and water, boiling five minutes. Core and pare apples; cook slowly in the syrup; cover closely and watch carefully. When tender, lift out the apples, add a little lemon juice to syrup and pour over apples. The cavities in the apples may be filled with jelly or raisins.

• • •

Keep the top on the milk bottle so the milk does not absorb ice box or refrigerator odors from other foods.

LITTLE did Jack Benny know what he was letting himself in for when he decided to go to New York for a few weeks and do his broadcasting from there. So many requests for tickets came in, and from very important people too, that the largest studio at Radio City wasn't anywhere near big enough to hold them.

So, National Broadcasting company had to rent the biggest ballroom of the Waldorf-Astoria and send the Benny broadcast out from there. Jack is one of those big, affable, patient fellows who can remember practically everybody he ever met, and he has met thousands in his years of vaudeville, musical comedy, pictures, and radio.

First results of the Academy of Motion Picture Arts awards are beginning to be noticed at the studios. Luise Rainer, whose performance in "The Great Ziegfeld" was voted best of the year, has been given a five-year contract by Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. Paul Muni, who got the year's award for the best actor for his work in "The Story of Louis Pasteur," evidently figures that he won't be out of a job for a long time, so he is talking to contractors about building extensive dog kennels at his house. Someone has given him a valuable schnauzer, and he is shopping around for some other dogs.

Edgar Bergen, the ventriloquist who has become such a favorite on the Rudy Vallee radio hour, has joined the wonderful array of comics, opera singers, and dancers that Sam Goldwyn has lined up for his Goldwyn Follies. Bergen's skill as a ventriloquist was developed when he was just a youngster. He liked to play jokes on his mother, making strange voices call to her from various parts of the room. Later he worked his way through Northwestern university giving shows at college parties.

Apparently Sam Goldwyn won't be happy until he signs up simply everyone of note in the entertainment world for his Follies company. Over in London he has put Vera Zorina, sensationally successful young ballerina, under contract. You may have seen her in person, for last year and the year before she toured the United States, playing in one hundred and ten cities with the Monte Carlo ballet company. She won't just dance in Goldwyn pictures, but will be groomed as a dramatic player.

Jane Withers just dares any kidnaper to come around her house threatening her now. In addition to her usual bodyguard, a Texas Ranger who looks as if he could rout an army single-handed, her father is usually around, and he has been sworn in as a deputy sheriff, complete with guns. Furthermore, there is an electric signal beside her bed which rings a bell in all the police stations near Beverly Hills. Everybody is betting that the mischievous Jane will never be able to resist pushing the button just once, just to see the police come dashing to her rescue.

CHAPTER I

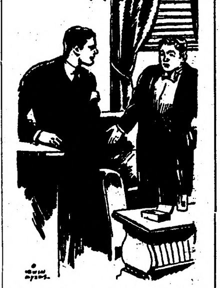
—1—

Bryn finished his story. Tall, lean, bronzed, he stood before the big crystal mirror hanging over the stone fireplace and examined his chin critically. It was a very nice chin, but Bryn was not in the least concerned with its niceness; he was trying to determine whether Burch had or had not nicked it infinitesimally. It seemed not. Burch had done his usual perfect job.

Tubby, his eyes round and distracted, dropped into one of the deep morocco armchairs and stared out at the dusk. It was pouring like smoke across the bay, sifting through the Golden Gate to blot out the sunset. The daily fleet of fishing vessels, their sails a row of tiny dark triangles against the dimming face of the sun, slipped out once more to brave the perils of the vasty deep. Below the house the waves lapped idly at the white cliff, gentle and harmless.

Tubby was not a philosopher, and he had very little imagination. To Tubby a horse was a horse, usually with four legs and a tail. It was not something over which kingdoms might be lost or with which princesses might be rescued. Waves to Tubby were waves, always wet and often chilly. But now, as he stared down through the wide plate glass window, there was a look of positive inspiration on his face, as if he were telling himself that these waves, at least, might sometimes wash the shores of China, the far, far, dangerous shores of China; that these waves might easily, small and tender though they now appeared, might easily puff and swell and lift themselves to fall with thunder and fury on one of the innocent little vessels drifting now so serenely past the sun. Life was like that, Tubby was convinced.



"Did It Ever Occur to You That Ted Holworthy Might Be Engineering This Beautiful Mix-up?"

Tubby put his head down into his hands and groaned. It sounded like a stage groan, although he was certainly sincere about it; and even if it was not his situation, which it wasn't, he felt that someone ought to react to it properly.

"Nonsense," Bryn said briskly.

Tubby looked up. His pink cheeks sagged. His mouth drooped. He would have been the picture of dejection if his yellow hair had not insisted on standing on end. But he thought he was the picture of extreme dejection.

"Look here, Bryn," he said in a woebegone voice, "you can't go through with it. I won't let you. That's final."

"Tut-tut," Bryn responded amiably. He pressed a bell on the mantelpiece. Burch, bland and serene, opened the door noiselessly. Bryn looked at him in the mirror.

"A cocktail, Burch, for Mr. Forbes. Perhaps you might put a little peppermint in it. He is a little upset."

The faint shadow of a smile hovered over Burch's impassive lips. "And for yourself, sir?"

"Thank you, no. By the way, Burch, I am being married this evening."

There was a moment of dead stillness as if even the waves had halted in their irresistible course. Then Burch swallowed, and said nobly, "Indeed, sir? Do you wish me to procure a maidservant, sir?"

Bryn looked up, startled. "A maidservant? Do we need a maidservant?"

"I was thinking of your wife, sir."

"My wife?" Bryn repeated, his eyes coming sharply to Burch's face. Then, "Ah . . . no. She will not be coming here."

"Very good, sir. What shall I pack?"

Bryn looked down at the gray suit with which, Tubby had insisted, he was desecrating the evening. He considered. "Well, shirts and things. Nothing else, except those old golf trousers I got so much mud on at Tahoe."

"Yes, sir. Nothing else? No guns? No fishing tackle? No golf clubs?"

"Nothing. By the way—I am a young engineer out of work because of the depression. Anything a young engineer out of work because of the depression wouldn't have, I wouldn't have. I've pawned it."

Burch drew a noticeable deep breath. "Very good, sir. Shall you be here to breakfast?"

"Certainly."

"And . . ."

"No, I said she wasn't coming."

"Ah . . . yes, sir. Lunch?"

"No lunch. I shall be leaving immediately after breakfast, and you needn't prepare dinner until approximately a year from tonight. I will let you know. I shall be away during that time."

"Yes, sir. And the orders for Morton?"

Bryn swung round from the glass. He regarded Burch thoughtfully. "That's so," he said meditatively. "I might have forgotten. Tell Morton to take a spanner, will you, and remove the paint—not all of it, but large, uneven portions—from the Bellaire. Tell him to take a chisel and give it some nice deep scratches. Tell him to make it look like a car I might have bought for about forty-two dollars and fifty cents from a bankrupt gangster. He might bash up the fenders, and if anything further occurs to him . . ."

"The Bellaire, sir? The new French motor? The black car?"

"All of those things," Bryn said calmly.

Tubby stood up. His eyes rested on Burch's agitated countenance. He drew a deep breath.

"That's all," Bryn said crisply.

"Yes, sir," Burch muttered despondently, and went out.

Tubby was staring at Bryn. "Anybody would think you were in love with the girl," he said.

"Would they? How nice. It sounds so much better. So much more romantic and idyllic. To be in love with one's bride instead of marrying her for her money."

"Money!" Tubby said bitterly. "Money!" He shook his head miserably. "You're making some kind of a damn fool out of yourself, Bryn. You're letting some gang pull a fast one on you, that's what you're doing. Do you think for a minute that that girl doesn't know who you are?"

"She doesn't," Bryn said calmly.

Tubby snorted. "That's a bright remark, isn't it? Very bright. Now, I ask you, how in God's name could anybody on the Pacific coast help having seen your ugly mug in the papers, how could anybody who can read help knowing about James Weldon Shipley Brynildson Third and his speed boats and his elephant tusks and his seven cars and his polo ponies?"

"I'm sure she can read," Bryn replied, unruffled. "The first time I saw her she was reading over a lot of legal documents up in Holworthy's office."

Tubby eyed him for a long moment. Then he said gustily, "Look here, Bryn. Did it ever occur to you that Ted Holworthy himself might be engineering this beautiful mix-up? Did it?"

"I can't say that it did."

"All this talking he's been doing about her. What did he tell you about her for in the first place? Oh, I know he said it was an interesting case, but that was just to get you listening. And now he's gone away just when she puts in her appearance. It all looks pretty funny to me."

"Didn't you think it was an interesting case, Tubby?"

"Well, if it was a case, yes. Certainly. Of course. I thought myself it was interesting. But you notice I didn't get all wrought up about it and start hanging around to get a look at the girl, and even if I had I wouldn't even dream of stepping into a game like this and marrying her myself."

Why Laxatives Fail In Stubborn Constipation

Twelve to 24 hours is too long to wait when relief from clogged bowels and constipation is needed, for then enormous quantities of bacteria accumulate, causing GAS, indigestion and many restless, sleepless nights.

If you want REAL, QUICK RELIEF, take a liquid compound such as Adlerika. Adlerika contains SEVEN cathartic and carminative ingredients that act on the stomach and BOTH bowels. Most "overnight" laxatives contain one ingredient that acts on the lower bowel only.

Adlerika's DOUBLE ACTION gives your system a thorough cleansing, bringing out old poisonous waste matter that may have caused GAS pains, sour stomach, headaches and sleepless nights for months.

Adlerika relieves stomach GAS at once and usually removes bowel congestion in less than two hours. No waiting for overnight results. This famous treatment has been recommended by many doctors and druggists for 35 years. Take Adlerika one-half hour before breakfast or one hour before bedtime and in a short while you will feel marvelously refreshed. At all Leading Druggists.

"Rat Trap"

By FLOYD GIBBONS
Famous Headline Hunter

"CAUGHT like a rat in a trap!" That's a pretty moving expression. When you say that of a man you mean that he's in pretty dire straits—facing a fate that's inhuman and fit only for beasts. But what about being caught WITH rats—hundreds of rats—in a trap you've set for them yourself? That's what Charley Mack was up against. And it's an experience he doesn't want to go through again, either.

Charley's home is in Brooklyn, N. Y. In 1928 he was working for an exterminating concern, and on a day in June of that year he was ordered to the Erie Basin section of Brooklyn to tackle the job of clearing out a tramp steamer that was over-run with rats.

Two other men were working with Charley on that job. They arrived at the ship at ten o'clock on a Sunday morning. The job had to be done on Sunday when the crew was off duty so as not to interfere with the loading of freight. The only man aboard the ship was the watchman. On reaching the ship, the exterminator's first job was to get every human or animal on board out of the way. The watchman was notified to stay in the open, and the mate's dog was given to him to take care of.

Working With Poison Gas.

The next job was to shut all the portholes and seal up all cracks, for the work was to be done with poison gas, and none of it must escape. After that a small batch of gas was set off to test the gas masks the men wore. The masks were all right, and they took their final precaution. They agreed to meet at a certain place on deck in half an hour. And in case one of them didn't appear—well that meant something was wrong and the others would go searching for him.

The three men proceeded to their appointed parts of the ship. "My scene of operations," says Charlie, "was the galley where the food was kept—the worst infested part of the ship. After a final inspection I put on my mask and set off the cyanide fumes. I started it in the huge ice box and waited until the fumes were thick. Then I went to the door to leave. My first shock came when I found that when the ice-box door had slammed shut the latch had dropped into the socket on the outside, making me a PRISONER."

Charley pounded on the door, but his two co-workers were in distant parts of the ship and couldn't hear him. And then, in a few minutes, the parade began. Rats—hundreds of them—some of them as big as cats, began streaming out of hidden corners where the gas had reached, trying to get out into clean air.

Crazed Rats All Over Him.

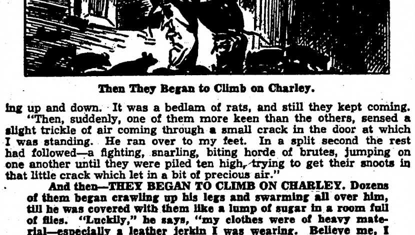
"I began pounding on the door more frantically," says Charley. By this time the room was full of gas and the rats began to feel the effects of it. It seemed to make them go crazy. They began screeching and running this way and that, looking for air, biting one another and jumping up and down. It was a bedlam of rats, and still they kept coming.



Then They Began to Climb on Charley.

"Then, suddenly, one of them more keen than the others, sensed a slight trickle of air coming through a small crack in the door at which I was standing. He ran over to my feet. In a split second the rest had followed—a fighting, snarling, biting horde of brutes, jumping on one another until they were piled ten high, trying to get their snoots in that little crack which let in a bit of precious air."

And then—THEY BEGAN TO CLIMB ON CHARLEY. Dozens of them began crawling up his legs and swarming all over him, till he was covered with them like a lump of sugar in a room full of flies. "Luckily," he says, "my clothes were of heavy material—especially a leather jerkin I was wearing. Believe me, I began to perspire. My legs began to feel the bites of the maddened creatures and I had to put my hands in my jacket pockets to keep them from being bitten off.

"There I stood for what seemed hours, with hands in my pockets, my elbows tucked in, and my head down on my chest to protect as great a part of me as possible. I waited—waited for the gas to take its toll, but the seconds seemed like hours. My mind began to play tricks on me—making me think the gas was weak—wondering what would happen if all three of us were caught in the same jam and had to stay there all night. What thoughts you have when you're in a predicament of that sort!"

Charley Was Badly Bitten.

Charley's coat and trousers were in shreds. His legs were paining with half a hundred bites. "I'd rather fight a mad police dog than one of those rats," he says, "and the memory of those animals lingers to this day." But at last there came a knock on the ice-box door, and Charley heard the voice of one of his co-workers asking if he was in there. Charley yelled back that he was trapped, and the other fellow opened the door.

Then it was the other fellow's turn to get a scare. Rats—almost a hundred of them—burst out of that door in a snarling, fighting mass and began dashing about the galley.

They were plenty weak by that time, and the fresh air took their attention. That was lucky for the other fellow, too, for they forgot to bite him. Some of the critters scrambled along the deck, and others seemed to go crazy and throw themselves into the water. Others ran a short distance and dropped. It was a great sight—and just about the most shivery one I ever saw in my life."

Charley went to a doctor and had the rat bites treated. None of them got infected, and he was all right in a short while. As a matter of fact, he was back on the job again the next Sunday—exterminating rats on the same ship. The job hadn't been done right and the whole routine had to be repeated.

But this time Charley stayed away from the ice-box.

Sacking of Washington

The most publicized action of the British troops which invaded the Capital during the War of 1812 was the burning of the Executive Mansion, which since has been termed the White House. This, however, was only part of the destruction of the occupation. Other public buildings to be destroyed by fire included the Capitol, the State and Navy buildings and the Treasury. A number of private homes were set afire and burned down as well. The offices of the National Intelligencer, which had particularly aroused the ire of the British troops, also was leveled by flames.

Odd Ways of Greeting

Polite Arabs used to kiss the hands of their superiors. But when two Arabs of equal rank met, neither wished to appear conceited by allowing the other to kiss his hand. This meant a scuffle, and soon a compromise—they shook hands. There are many queer handshakes. The Ainu, living in northern Japan, rubs his palms together and strokes his beard. Negro chiefs snap the middle finger three times when greeting their friends. On Banks Island, British Columbia, Canada, men lock the middle fingers of their right hands. Both then pull their fingers loose with a crack.

You Need Not Stop Reading in Order to Rest the Eyes

Good Advice Given by Ophthalmologist

Cambridge, Mass. — Read when, where and how you like, but insist on sufficient illumination, use glasses if glasses are necessary, and have a periodic eye examination every two or three years.

This is the fundamental principle for the care of the eyes, Dr. Theodore L. Terry, instructor in ophthalmology at the Harvard medical school, declared in an address here.

Do not try to save your vision by avoiding reading, sewing or the movies, he advised, because eyes do not wear out. It is disease, he declared, that destroys vision.

To avert disease he advised periodic examinations. Often, he said, diseased conditions can be discovered in such examinations before the patient notices any symptoms. Naturally the eyes are then much more amenable to early treatment than when the maladies progress.

Some Danger Signals.

Aside from these regular examinations, however, Dr. Terry also urged examinations when any blurring of vision, inflammation or pain in the eyes, or headaches related to their use, is noticed. Important danger signals, he warned, are rainbow-like halos around artificial lights, and blurred vision early in the morning which clears as the day advances.

Any eye examination, he emphasized, should invariably include a general survey of the eye as a whole because that organ very frequently can be used as a barometer of disease in some other part of the body. At times, he said, evidence of other dangerous diseases have been found in eye examinations, and, again, many are amenable to treatment if discovered early. Included among diseases of this type, he cited, are kidney disorders, tuberculosis, syphilis, various blood diseases, several types of poisons and even brain tumors.

The Eye Grows.

Periodic check-ups, he continued, are also important to meet changing conditions of the eye, for that organ, like the fingernails and the hair, has the ability to grow throughout life. Thus, even adults occasionally need changes of glasses, possibly every two years. If glasses need to be changed every few months, he warned, it may be the beginning of a serious disease, maybe glaucoma, diabetes or cataract.

While improper glasses do not produce permanent damage to the eyes, except in the case of crossed eyes or possibly in nearsightedness, they may be responsible for ocular fatigue, sleepiness and headaches.

Concerning crossing of the eyes, Dr. Terry said that in many instances it can be corrected by glasses if they are used soon after the condition begins, even in children eighteen months of age. An operation corrects the appearance but does not restore normal eye condition. A misalignment in the adult, he said, is usually due to a spasm or paralysis of one or more of the eye-turning muscles and may indicate serious trouble.

Ground Fire Found Bad Medicine for West's White Pine

Washington.—Fire in the forest, which is now actually used in the South as a tool for the control of yellow pine timber growth, is still wholly "bad medicine" so far as western white pine is concerned.

So declares E. F. Rapraeger of the U. S. Forest Service, who has recently completed a study of fire effects in the great historic timberlands of Idaho, which Lewis and Clark saw on their famous exploration trip during the presidency of Thomas Jefferson. Mr. Rapraeger has studied extensive areas of Western white pine in this region, and finds that the effects of even "mild" ground fires are never beneficial.

Bad In Three Ways.

He found that fire damage was discernible in three different ways: through understocking and reduced yields, through decay started in burn - wounds on the trees and through the encouragement of excessive branching which results in rough timber of lowered market value.

Mr. Rapraeger concludes: "Evidently complete protection from fire is essential from infancy to maturity if the aim is to grow Western white pine of high quality

It's a Party Sure Enough!

AND the girl holding the curtains back, just looking on, might be joining the fun except for her misconception that "party" clothes are hard to sew. She made the neat sweet house model she's wearing with no trouble at all—but—

And Here's the Story.

"Marge, did you really make your pretty dress all yourself? It looks so elaborate; I'd be afraid to cut into chiffon like that for fear I'd ruin it."

"Be yourself, Rose. It doesn't take a bit more skill to make my dress than yours. The pattern explains everything. You can't go wrong. I get a double kick out of making a party frock—I feel important sewing it and elegant wearing it. I couldn't begin to have so many party clothes if I didn't belong to The-Sew-Your-Own!

Mother Made Daughter's Dress.

"Joanie, dear, aren't you beginning this party business pretty young?"

"No, Auntie Rose, of course not. I've another one just like it that Grandma made for me. It's red and it has blue bands around it. I'm going to wear it to school tomorrow.

"Well, I see where I've got to get some silks and crepe, pluck up my nerve, and have clothes like other people. I wanted to join the Jolly Twelve but I just felt I didn't have anything to wear. Now I've decided to join The Sewing Circle and make a real fashion debut, come Spring!"

The Patterns.

Pattern 1237 is for sizes 34 to 46. Size 36 requires 4⅜ yards of 35 inch material plus five-eighths of a yard contrasting.

Pattern 1241 is cut in sizes 14 to 20 (32 to 44 bust). Size 16 requires 4⅝ yards of 39 inch material, and 1½ yards of ribbon for the belt together with 3 yards of machine made trimming.

Pattern 1852 comes in sizes 2 to 8 years. Size 4 requires 2⅛ yards of 35 or 39 inch material. To trim as pictured 6 yards of ribbon are required.

Local Items

Lucille Gavere came Saturday from Minneapolis for a visit at the home of her mother Mrs. Anna Gavere.

After spending half the night celebrating a birthday party, two young men left in separate cars for home. They drove different routes but as they lived in the same neighborhood, they eventually had to cross their route somewhere. It so happened that while driving at a reckless rate of speed, they collided at one of the intersections. Both of them got out and were about to engage in a heated argument about driving while drunk when suddenly they recognized one another.

This driving while under the influence of liquor is a subject that comes up frequently in safety discussions and to me there is only one sound piece of advice to eliminate this type of accident. Here it is:

If you must drink, don't drive.
If you must drive, don't drink.

Bible Camp at Wabanica

Considerable interest has been shown in this community concerning the Lake of the Woods Bible camp at the Wabanica camp grounds, near Baudette. Several people from this community have signified their intention of spending a week there this summer. All are invited to join the group this summer, the minimum age limit being that the young people should be confirmed. The Bible Camp Association of which Rev. Hanson is a member of the Board of Trustees, met at Badger on Monday, March 8, and the dates of July 5th to the 11th were set as the time for the camp this summer.

The association owns 75 acres of land at Wabanica bordering on the Rainy River and it includes the parsonage property formerly owned by Rev. Grefthen, pioneer pastor of that section.

At this meeting, Rev. Fjelstad of Thief River Falls, camp dean, announced that arrangements for the faculty were now complete. The faculty is as follows: Bible Study, Rev. Clarence P. Hall, Fergus Falls.

Youth Problems, Miss Frida Nilson, Dean of Women, Concordia College, Moordead, Minn.

Old Testement Characters, Dr. M. O. Wee, Professor of Old Testement, Luther Theological Seminary, St. Paul.

Inspirational Services, Rev. O. T. Haaland, Cyrus, Minn.

Dean of Women, Miss Grace Dahle, St. Hilaire.

Dean of Men, Rev. A. L. Abrahamson, Badger.

Music Director, Rev. M. T. Johnson, Greenbush.

Camp Manager, Rev. H. O. Aasen, Baudette.

Housing Manager, Rev. T. C. L. Hanson, Holt.

Canteen Manager Rev. H. O. Peterson, Viking.

Librarian, Rev. Jabob Askeland Baudette.

An effort is being made by the pastors of the circuit to collect enough money for a down payment on an auditorium building.

At this meeting, the expense fee per person for the entire week was set at $4.00. This includes registration fee, board, lodging, etc.

The Bible Camp movement is spreading fast and is a wonderful experience for a person to spend a few days there. One returns refreshened spiritually, mentally and physically.

In every home there should be someone who will give a little thought to the stairs and steps.

In the first place, are the stairs properly constructed or or are they worn or broken?

Are they used as shelves for storage of materials?

Are they slippery?

Are they improperly lighted,

Are they of a dangerous circular type?

Are the steps to high or too low?

Stairways that have steps only three or four inches high are even more dangerous than those where the steps are too high. Falls kill about 17,000 people a a year and injure hundreds of thousands of others. Inspect the stairways in your home regularly and see that no member of your family is injured because of someone's carelessness.

SYNOPSIS

Bryn (James Brynildson III), a tall bronzed young man of wealth, and his chum, Tubby Forbes, are discussing Bryn's coming marriage. Tubby believes it a scheme to get Bryn's wealth from him.

"Neither did I," Bryn said. "I never dreamed of such a thing. But I was curious, I'll admit that. You haven't any curiosity because you haven't got any imagination. If you had, you'd have been hanging around, too. You'd have wanted to look at the man in the case, when he arrived for this wedding to a girl he'd never seen, and then when you saw the man you'd certainly have wanted to get a look at the girl, and when you saw the girl . . ." Bryn paused. Tubby looked at him curiously, but Bryn coughed and went on immediately. "When you saw the girl you would most assuredly have wanted to know how it was all going to come out. She . . . well, she wasn't his type, Tub."

"You're saying just what I've been trying to say," Tubby cried. "Holworthy's been working on your imagination. He knows what you're like. Well, it's succeeded. Everything's gone according to plan. You're roped. Tonight you're going to marry this girl that you've only seen three times, a girl you don't really know a darn thing about, just because she has some kind of cock-and-bull story about having to get married before her twenty-first birthday and the man she's supposed to marry doesn't happen to take her fancy. Of course he wouldn't take her fancy with you around. Certainly he wouldn't. That's what it's all about, you darn idiot. You. James Weldon Shipley Brynildson Third. Ye gods and little fishes, aren't there enough men on the coast who would marry her for this fifty thousand dollars she's supposed to be paying you, without you stepping into it? It's so damned absurd. What are you doing it for? Fifty thousand dollars doesn't mean anything to you! And they've got it all worked out so that there'll be plenty of publicity and trouble when you want a divorce . . . you going up into the Oregon backwoods to live with her for a year. So romantic! And she'll turn out to be a cheap little crook, but she'll be married to you all the same and entitled to a lot of your property when the break comes, and your name as well. Doesn't it sound beautiful?"

"Don't be an ass," Bryn said comfortably. "We went to school with Ted Holworthy. Anyway, I happen to know that this business is on the level, because I've known about the case for years. As a matter of fact, it was I who asked Holworthy about it last year, if you'll remember, which you probably won't. I met the old gentleman himself, Deborah's grandfather, when he was here eight years ago fixing the will up with Ted's father. It was just when I was taking over my property and spending a good deal of time in Holworthy's office. The old gentleman was a most interesting old chap, and we had several long conversations. He was intensely concerned about this will he was making, and very anxious to make sure that he was doing the right thing. The old man put the thing up to me as a hypothetical case and asked me what I thought of it. Being a young fool, I thought it sounded fine."

"So now," Tubby said, eyeing him, "when it doesn't look as if it might be so fine, you feel responsible? Is that it? Is that why you're throwing yourself away like a sack of soft potatoes?"

Bryn sighed. "I do wish you'd go and change your clothes," he said. "You can't be my best man in a white tie and tails, not when I'm wearing a lounge suit. We'd probably have another earthquake."

"And what about Pilar?"

"Pilar?"

"Pilar D'Avillo? What about her?"

"Well, what about her?"

"For two years you've carted her around. She's had a smile for the last 23 months like a mouse in a cheese barrel. Everybody thinks you're going to marry her. She'll go blooey when she hears this. Have you told her anything at all?"

"How could I tell her? I wasn't sure myself until two hours ago, when I telephoned you. I couldn't telephone her, could I? Hello, Pilar, I'm going to marry a girl in a few minutes. And there's no reason why I should. I've never asked her to marry me, or even hinted about it."

"Well, I don't have to tell her, do I?"

"That's a bright idea," Bryn said happily. "Thanks, old man. I'll do the same for you one of these days."

"What'll happen," Tubby said miserably, "is that she'll have me marrying her myself."

"Well, that's all right, Bryn assured him. "You've always wanted to, anyway. Now, on your way, Tubby. Go and get dressed. Burch will bring you your cocktail, and lend you one of his shirts and a collar. You can wear my pants if you're careful not to take a deep breath, but I don't think you'd better try buttoning the coat. All in keeping . . . she'll think you got them second hand."

"Marry Pilar?"

"Certainly. She's just the wife for you. There's the blood of the conquistadores in Pilar. It'll take that to keep you from getting any fatter. Go on. You've only got five minutes."

Twenty-three years previously, Anne Whittaker Larned had eloped, on the morning of the day of her wedding to Courtney Graham, and had married a young man, who, had he been a woman, would never have been received in the society in which the Larneds moved. The consequences were disastrous. The young man had no money, but he had expected to have a great deal when the Larneds relented and forgave their only daughter. However, he encountered unexpected difficulties with the daughter herself; for when she discovered why he had married her, she crept away from him, her heart as nearly broken as a physical organ can be broken by human unhappiness, and when her daughter was only a few days old, she died. Fortunately, the young father—who never knew that he was a father—was kicked in a vital spot by a horse, and died before he could cause any more misfortune; thus strengthening the belief of a number of people in the vengeance and justice of God.

The aged and broken grandparents took their daughter's child and also the blame for their daughter's unhappiness. If, they told themselves miserably, they had guarded her well, she would never have met this handsome young scoundrel, and all would have been as they had planned. She would have married Courtney Graham, scion of an old and spotless family, and all her ways would have been ways of pleasantness and all her paths would have been paths of peace.

The Grahams were among the first people of Boston. Nowhere on their escutcheon could be found a blot, and even the erasure marks were so carefully done as to leave no trace. A perfect marriage, it would have been. But their daughter was dead, and their bitter regret was in vain. However, they still had the child, and over the mother's grave they vowed to themselves that nothing should mar this girl's life. They dedicated their remaining years to her. It seemed to them that they must creep out of the world with her, hide her, find for her a sanctuary.

They had sold the historic mansion in Boston, and with their beautiful old household goods, had gone west as far as they could go, out to the Oregon wilderness. There, in the most glorious natural surroundings, they had built a huge stone house, as like the Boston house as possible, and filled it with their treasures. They were miles from the nearest town, and cut off from all easy contact with civilization.

Here the child, Deborah, grew up, with only her grandparents and the servants for her companions. Save for one trip to Boston with her grandmother when she was eight years old, she had scarcely been off her grandfather's land. In the early years, when she was yet a small child, she went infrequently with her grandparents over the rough mountain roads to the little country town, or was perhaps allowed to accompany old Gary, their servant, on a marketing expedition; but as she grew older, and her mother's beauty began to evidence itself in her, she was kept more and more closely at home. There were quite often guests at the great house when Deborah was a child, but they were grave elderly people like her grandparents, so that she grew up completely cut off from companions of her own age and generation. She had, however, a library full of books, and three people entirely devoted to her welfare.

It must be admitted that of the three, Grandfather, Grandmother and Gary, it was Gary who taught her the most interesting things. Grandfather taught her history, and science, and geography, and political economy; if he was a little vague in places it was because there are matters, of course, with which a woman need not sully her pure mind. Grandmother taught her needlework, and a number of things that made them both blush and over which they skipped as hastily as possible. But Gary—Gary told her stories of people.

"Now you'll never believe it," he would begin, "but it's a fact. I saw it with my own eyes."

"Saw what, Gary darling?" Deborah would ask delightedly, curling up her feet underneath her on the table. "What did you see with your very own eyes?"

"It was once when I was in New York," he would begin. "I was walking down Fifth avenue one day . . . that's a very interesting street, Miss Deborah, the most interesting street in the world, I've been told . . . and right in front of me there was a young lady walking along, all dressed up in a picture hat and feather boa two yards long, and she was crying. Crying fit to kill, if you can imagine it. . . ."

Yes, there was Gary. Grandfather and Grandmother kept the iron gates leading to the world locked and barred, but Gary lifted the shutters of a thousand little windows, magic casements, all of them, opening on the foam of perilous seas.

By VIRGINIA VALE

JUST as motion picture theater managers all over the country are planning to abandon Bank night and lamenting that the custom ever was started, a radio sponsor is said to be figuring on a way to adopt it. Certain legal, or rather illegal, aspects of the case have to be ironed out before it can be definitely announced, but present plans call for the weekly award of one thousand dollars to some listener holding the lucky number. Numbers will be printed on the package containing the sponsor's product, purchasers will mail them to the broadcast studio, and there the drawing will be held which selects the winner.

Hollywood studios have always flattered themselves that they paid their performers the highest salaries in the world, but now it appears that Mae West, Marlene Dietrich, and Greta Garbo are just poor working girls in comparison to Gracie Fields, who is England's favorite star. Twentieth Century-Fox could not let the British studios get away with a monopoly on the best of anything, so they have put Miss Fields under contract to make four pictures in Hollywood. None of the pictures she has made in England have been shown here, because in them Miss Fields spoke the Lancashire dialect which might as well be Czecho-Slovakian for all Americans can make of it. Over here she will deliver her lines and songs in plain English.

From New York to Hollywood Gloria Swanson's loyal friends gave parties celebrating the end of her too-long retirement from the screen, when Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer announced recently that she was to star in "Maisie Kenyon." Now it appears that the celebrating was a little premature, because neither Gloria nor the studio is satisfied with the story, and her plans are all up in the air again.

The most exciting and beautiful picture ever made in Technicolor comes from England and will soon be seen in theaters throughout the country. It is "Wings of the Morning" a United Artists picture. Harold Shuster went over from Hollywood to direct it, our own Henry Fonda plays the lead, and John McCormack, the Irish tenor who is adored wherever there is a phonograph, radio, or concert hall sings in it. As if that weren't enough, they have tossed in for good measure authentic views of the running of the English Derby.

Sylvia Sidney gets the week's award for being the best talent scout. Some time ago Marc Connelley told her about a play he was going to produce in New York and she said that she knew just the girl to play the lead in it. She had seen a girl named Katherine Locke in a very small part in a play and she was sure Miss Locke would be wonderful if given a real chance. Sylvia didn't wait for Mr. Connelley to send for Miss Locke. She located her and she got the part.

Eleanor Powell would like to form an alumni association of her old dancing school, but all the people who are eligible for membership in Hollywood are much too busy making pictures to be bothered with attending meetings. There is Ginger Rogers, Buddy Ebsen, Ruby Keeler, and Miriam Hopkins — and they are among the busiest people out here. Eleanor herself has a little time on her hands only because she turned her ankle and has to stay at home for a few days to rest before she can go into a strenuous number for "Broadway Melody."

ODDS AND ENDS—Marlene Dietrich thinks that she and Carole Lombard look alike and both girls are delighted . . . Miriam Hopkins has bought the late John Gilbert's house, and is redecorating it in lovely pastel colors that best set off her blond beauty . . . Paul Muni has no lurking ambition to cut in on Jack Benny's comic honors, but he did play "The Bee" on the violin for a few friends . . . About half of the beautiful girls in Hollywood tried out for the part of Flavia in "The Prisoner of Zenda." Madleine Carroll got it . . . Bert Wheeler is so unwilling to leave the sunshine and swank of Palm Springs that he is commuting to Hollywood by airplane . . .

Harmonizing With Spring

THIS week's crop of fashions seem fully as sweet and gay and long-awaited as lovely Spring —with which they're meant to harmonize. Mary, Sue and Emily, three charming standees, know how to have day in day out chic without forfeiting that pretty silver lining in their new Spring purses.

Hints From Mary's Boudoir.

"I'm especially fussy about the slip I wear, perhaps that's why I always sew-my-own! I never miss the few hours it takes, and I can spend the difference for a finer, better-wearing fabric. A slip that's well-behaved is a joy to yourself—others as well—and just as easy to have. So take a tip from one who knows: choose this model and a good fabric and you'll have no further slip troubles."

A Lift for M'Lady.

"A new frock means more to me than a new fabric and a change of color—it means a lift, a new lease on life!" So says Miss Sue, a snappy sophomore who sews. "I decided 1252 had the kind of newness I want: the clever cut of the waistcoat bodice first caught my fancy, and the saucy swing skirt made me sign on the dotted line. I go for simple necklines, and I like lots of buttons too. You should see my version in royal blue silk crepe—really, it's something to be proud of."

Designers Win Praise.

"Smart Matron your granny," retorts Emily to an intended bit of flattery regarding her new welcome to spring frock. "If I look as young as I feel I'll be mistaken for a Laf-a-Lot! But honestly, this new dress gives me a more dressed-up feeling than any I can remember in Springs gone by. I think Sew-Your-Own designers are smart to give us '40's' some of that swing the youngsters rave about. Do you suppose they sympathize with the poor young men who are urged nowadays to 'Swing, Swing, dear Mother-in-law'?"

Pattern 1909 is for sizes 14 to 20 (32 to 46 bust). Size 16 requires 2¾ yards of 39 inch material.

By Ben C. Hagglund

Grandi Objects

Dino Grandi, one of Mussolini's aces, filed a strong protest to recent French and English newspaper rejoicing over Loyalist victories. "Such news is inflammatory,' Dino says, "And might lead to war." It is certain that defeat is bad for fascism. Spain right now is a testing ground for various nations participating. If the fascists are satisfied with their strength!—we're off to the bloodiest war of conquest ever fought. If the Loyalists win, no matter what kind of government Spain gets, Europe will know peace for a while. It must be evident to anyone who has read about European affairs that Russia and France are both interested in promoting peace, to strengthen their people's governments.

Of course news of Loyalists victories is inflammatory. Mussolini and Hitler wear the masks of neutrality with little are; no one is in doubt about what "neutrality" means to the fascists.

Reform in the Stock Exchange?

The New York Stock Exchange is tightening up on its ethics and practices, according to a recent news dispatch. Henceforth all stocks will be given a cold eye, and shady and doubtful deals will be given the cold shoulder.

What does it mean? It means that in this gambling den new, small ventures will not be heard any more. Only concerns with prestige, money, or big names will get attention. This is only another step on the way to centralization of wealth. Under the high-sounding slogan of "truth in business' the wolves of Wall Street clamp down on small enterprise. Henceforth only the extra-privileged will be able to fleece the lamb.

Crime and Punishment

A sexual pervert assaults and kills a girl in Minneapolis, and society shudders at the horrible monster of its own creating. Fear and superstition, bred of ignorance, run rampant. High officials in the seats of power are swept on in the tidal wave of medieval frenzy. Devils are loose!

In the minds of everyone is the desire to find someone guilty of the horrible crime, and to hang that one, or burn him, or stone him, or submit him to a hundred indignities. In this way our suppressed desires are satiated. We think that no punishment could be too severe for a sex criminal. In reality, we think no punishment could afford us too much fiendish pleasure.

Suppose we do catch a criminal and put him away in prison for keeps. What's to prevent other criminals from growing in the same environment? It must be plain to the unprejudiced thinker that the recurrance of such crimes points to some cause. Just as crimes against property may be traced to our unjust economic system, so crimes against the person may be traced to our unjust social system.

Let it not be understood that our economic system and our social system are two distinct and separate things. They are merely two different aspects of the same thing—Capitalism in all its ugliness.

The first thing that occurs to the average mind when a sex crime happens, is to double the police force. But this merely treats the effects, not the cause. The calvinistic conception of the individual as a being shot through and thru with wickedness, if only his natural instincts are given free rein, must give way to a saner and more modern view—that the individual is a creature of his environment and must be encouraged to express himself in a manner that is not anti-social.

It is evident that to do this we need regiments of psychology instructors to teach those who do not know, and psychopathic institutions for the victims of that ignorance. We have hospitals for those physically ill; why not hospitals for those mentally ill? The need calls for a system of government-subsidized clinics for the mentally abnormal.

Of course, all this is idealism, pure and simple. We should have many things we don't have in our much-boasted "civilization." The class-stratification of our society has led to many maladjustments —not the least of which is repression of the most vital instincts. Sex is still a no-man's land of speculation and mystery to most people. We need education on sex not only for adults but for children. Some old adages come in handy right here. "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure" and "Ignorance is the only crime."

CAPITOL NEWS REVIEW

BY A. I. HARRIS

A movement among college students to nominate President Roosevelt King Franklin I has subsided after a short campaign but a merry one. Spreading rapidly from one campus to another, 23 colleges responded with movements which, it was frankly admitted, were aimed to ridicule the President's proposals on the Supreme Court. The movement evidently collapsed of its own weight.

An interesting sidelight on the Chrysler sit-down strike may be found in Chrysler corporation figures, which show that the Company earned $62,100,000 in 1936, out of which it put $10,000,000 back into the company treasury and paid out the remaining $52,100,000 in dividends. Chrysler profits doubled between 1935 and 1936, the net income in 1935 being only $34,000,000. But the wages it paid its employees did not diuble. In 1936 it paid out to its workers only $90,000,000, making a 67 per cent profit on the transaction.

One group of Minnesota's organized teachers, the state Federation of Teachers, held its first regular convention this week in St. Paul. It should be recalled that free public education in America came as a result of the demands of the labor unions 100 years ago. Now that organized big business has seen the danger of an educated working class and has begun deliberate attempts to curtail the public school system, it is encouraging that teachers, too, have organized and joined the great labor federation in order to throw their support behind the people's drive for more and not less education.

Quick aid for Minnesota's drouth stricken farmers was asked by Governor Elmer A. Benson in a telegram to Harry L. Hopkins, Works Progress Administrator, last week.

Urging Hopkins to "do everything possible to employ the most needy on WPA, thereby increasing their monthly aid to tide them over until next harvest," the governor termed resettlement grants to farmers in the drouth area "wholly inadequate for subsistence needs, let alone livestock feed and seed."

Every major piece of legislation involving farm aid has been knocked out by the Supreme Court, says Farm Research, Inc. The decision written by the Court on the AAA stands out as the most sweeping opinion ever handed down in the courts. Not only did it obliterate the AAA and give millions of dollars to the processors, but it practically ruled that no federal aid to the farmers can be called constitutional.

Unless President Roosevelt's proposed reform of the Supreme Court goes through, it is commonly admitted that the substitute AAA, the Soil Conservation Act, will also be killed by the nine justices.

Tribute to the late Governor Floyd B. Olson was paid by the senate conservatives in a memorial service last week. Sen. Charles Orr delivered a eulogy of the late governor in which he said: "I think we can say that Floyd Olson helped immeasurably to give Minnesota a new and broader social vision. The causes which he championed and the vigor and zeal of his leadership have improved the lot of the great mass of our citizens. Floyd Olson was truly a great tonic for Minnesota."

It would appear that even medieval Georgia has some suggestions to offer Minnesota state senators. County commissioners of Bibb county, Georgia, have just recognized the 44-hour work week for convicts on chain gangs, but the state senators of Minnesota have refused to recognize it for women.

Resentment against conservative methods of delay which have slowed up the progress to legislation on capitol hill reached a climax last week as House Speaker Harold Barker of Elbow Lake, rebuked the obstructionists very sharply, and Senator Joseph Kozlak, Minneapolis Farmer-Laborite, openly charged that dilatory tactics were being used to kill progressive bills.

Conservatives have used several means of holding up measures. The easiest, as far as the senate is concerned, is to allow bills to lie in committee—inasmuch as all the upper body's committees are controlled by conservatives. The house has seen other methods utilized. The one which Barker exposed this week has been particularly flagrant. Several representatives are in the habit of offering worthless amendments, one by one, and defending them at great length, while work comes to a stop. Barker's rebuke included a warning to obstructionists to cease their efforts to prevent legislation being passed.

The house, despite delay tactics, passed two more tax measures last week, one calling for an increase in telephone company gross earnings taxes from 4 per cent to 7 per cent. Only the companies in the larger towns would be affected. The other is the gifts tax, that will catch some of the money wealthy folks give one another.

A bill consolidating all veterans activities into one department was reported favorably out of a joint house and senate committee this week. There are now five state agencies handling relief hospitalization, and claims for the nearly 120,000 veterans in the state. The coordination plan is favored by such organizations as the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the Military Order of the Purple Heart, Minneapolis chapter of the Disabled American Veterans, and the National Veterans Association.

Remington-Rand has finally come to terms with its employees who have been on strike since May, 1936. James Rand, Jr., was forced to negotiate with A. F. of L. metal trades officials and Secretary of Labor Perkins after the National Labor Relations Board had termed labor relations of the company "medieval."

It is time that liberty-loving people of the world gave thought to the plight of democracy in Spain. While democratic countries have steadfastly attempted to isolate the Spanish conflict and to avert another world war, the fascist countries, with brazoness unparalleled in modern times, have proceeded with their program of invasion. If democracy is to continue existence in the world, fascist adventures must be halted. It is time that democratic countries begin to take some stock.

BEFUDDLED BARBER

PINE RIVER—Lon Fields, local barber, has been busy these past few days denying that he is now running a pet shop. Recently a truck, overturning in front of the tonsorial establishment, released a shower of pigs, sheep, dogs, and chickens. Excited, the creatures crashed through the plate glass window of the shop, set off the fire alarm, threw the town into an uproar at 5 a. m.

Could it have been the Easter spirit which affected two LEWISTON hens last week? Apparently with childish interests at heart, the hens turned out a special variety of eggs less than an inch in length.

Prospects of an excellent autumn hunting season loomed bright when Charles Schurz of the federal bureau of roads reported that he had counted 3,200 pheasants in an "army of fowl" sighted near FAIRMONT.

TWIN CITY TWISTS

Holy Week in Twin City religious sanctuaries saw the largest church attendance figures in history.

Minneapolis and St. Paul traffic officials launched a safety drive to curb the rapidly rising toll of automobile deaths. Stiff fines were handed out to law violators.

The Minneapolis Edison high cagers, winners of the state basketball title, rested after the victory, appeared disinterested in a game with Minot, North Dakota champions.

From Perfectly Cut Patterns

"I'M GLAD I'm not on the serving committee this week," muses Mrs. Smith of Walnut street, as she takes stock of herself in the mirror preparatory to leaving for the church supper. "I look entirely too swell for me—why, I'm almost excited! I always knew surplice waists were becoming, but how becoming I never knew till now. That little deceptiveness is just what I need, and these sleeves are the most comfortable things! If about half our circle wore dresses like this it would be better for all concerned; so many of us have outgrown the tailored streamlined styles. Now, Mrs. White for instance—"

Enter an Admirer.

"Why Mother, you look de-lovely in that shade of blue! And you look real stylish, too—you ought to be going to a Coronation."

"Oh, I'd much prefer the church supper, dear. I'll be a somebody there in my new dress but at a Coronation I would be little potatoes. By the way, what did they say about your new jumper at school?"

"Mother, I meant to tell you. Mary Jane and Betty are both going to coax their mothers to make one just like it. I said maybe you would loan them the pattern, would you?"

"Why of course. Did you tell them it took me only two afternoons to make yours including two blouses?"

Enter "The Duchess."

"Sis, you're pretty young to be talking about clothes so intelligently. When you get a figure that clothes really count on—ahem, like Yours Truly's for instance; then it might be different —oh Mother, how nice! I'm crazy about it. Gee, such smart lines! Remember, you promised to help me with a new party frock next week if I did well with this shirtwaister. I wish all dresses were as easy to sew and as swell to wear as it is."

"Perfectly cut patterns spell success for any frock, Kay; your party dress is as good as made right now. But I must be on my way or I'll be more than fashionably late for the affair. Bye, bye —be good girls and see that Daddy gets something to eat."

Stomach Gas So Bad Seems To Hurt Heart

"The gas on my stomach was so bad I could not eat or sleep. Even my heart seemed to hurt. A friend suggested Adlerika. The first dose I took brought me relief. Now I eat as I wish, sleep fine and never felt better." —Mrs. Jas. Filler.

Adlerika acts on BOTH upper and lower bowels while ordinary laxatives act on the lower bowel only. Adlerika gives your system a thorough cleansing, bringing out old, poisonous matter that you would not believe was in your system and that has been causing gas pains, sour stomach, nervousness and headaches for months.

Dr. H. L. Shoub, New York, reports: "In addition to intestinal cleansing, Adlerika greatly reduces bacteria and colon bacilli."

Give your bowels a REAL cleansing with Adlerika and see how good you feel. Just one spoonful relieves GAS and stubborn constipation. At all Leading Druggists.

SYNOPSIS

Bryn (James Brynildson III), a tall bronzed young man of wealth, and his chum, Tubby Forbes, are discussing Bryn's coming marriage. Tubby believes it a scheme to get Bryn's wealth from him. Should the girl, Deborah, whom Bryn had met at the office of his attorney, Ted Holworthy, marry Stuart Graham before her twenty-first birthday, she will inherit a vast fortune from her grandfather. Stuart had greatly displeased Deborah, who refuses to marry him. Bryn, posing as an unemployed engineer, offers to marry Deborah, as Stuart, for $50,000, they not to live as man and wife. Twenty-three years previous, Anne Larned had eloped with an adventurer on the day set for her wedding to Courtney Graham. Two days after the birth of her daughter, Anne died. Shortly after, the father died. The Larneds, grandparents, took the child with them to Oregon where, without child companions, Deborah grew up.

But no matter how staunchly Grandfather and Grandmother kept the iron gates locked against the world, they knew that some day they would have to be opened, even if only to allow themselves to pass through, on their last journeys. For many years the question of Deborah's future, when the iron gates should be opened, gave them anxious hours of discussion. She would have a fortune greater than her father's before her, since it had grown through the years. She had no relatives other than her grandparents, and to depend on the guardianship of old family friends, most of whom had never been in sympathy with Grandfather's ideas about Deborah's upbringing, was impossible. Deborah must be completely secure. So, when she was thirteen, eight years ago, Grandfather had gone away to San Francisco on a journey, and when he returned he had stopped frowning, and they told her that her future happiness was taken care of.

Courtney Graham, less than a year after the marriage of Deborah's mother, had taken unto himself a wife. For him to do so had been a blow, but after talking it over for a number of years, Grandfather and Grandmother had consoled themselves by saying that of course Anne, as far as Courtney knew at the time of his marriage, was happy; that if she had been dead, Courtney would have devoted his life to mourning her loss, would have considered himself a widower. No; Courtney had been a perfect New England gentleman and he had done no wrong.

He had a son, born two months after Deborah herself. The boy's name was Stuart, and now at thirteen he was a tall handsome lad of great promise. His father and grandfather both thought that a second attempt at an alliance between the two families might prove a happy one. So it was understood that if the young people were willing, they should marry each other when they grew up.

It was here that Mr. Larned showed that his unhappy experience had not gone for nothing. He was determined to leave nothing to chance. He was determined that everything should contribute toward making the young people willing to marry each other—although, of course, there was not the slightest reason why they should not be. But he made his will, and it was a model of ingenuity. In it he said that his granddaughter Deborah should inherit the large part of his fortune, amounting to something over a million dollars in government bonds, if and only if she married Stuart Graham on or before her twenty-first birthday. On her twenty-first birthday her grandfather, if he were alive, would be eighty-five years of age. It was not likely that he would live long after that date, so the old man faced the situation squarely: if he should die before her twenty-first birthday, she and her grandmother were to live on the income from a selected list of more profitable securities chosen by him with great care; and if anything happened to prevent Deborah from marrying young Graham, then the fortune was to go to charities, but she was to have the income from the securities for life. The latter was sufficient to make her comfortable and keep her from want or poverty; but it was not sufficient to attract the attention of a scoundrelly fortune hunter such as her father had been.

The will was carefully planned and executed, and Grandfather smiled and nodded to himself whenever he thought of it. An absolute fool-proof and rogue-proof plan, he said to his wife over and over. In her gentle way she agreed.

Grandfather had died when Deborah was just past fifteen; and things had gone quite smoothly for nearly three years longer, with Gary managing everything, the house, the business letters, the money matters. But then something strange and unexpected had happened out in the world, and Gary began to go about with a worried frown. Finally — and Deborah was eighteen then—she had made him tell her the truth.

There was something about a crash in New York, something had toppled and fallen, and their careful list of securities had collapsed into a careless heap which was bringing them scarcely enough to live on. Grandmother didn't know, of course. Grandmother couldn't be told anything like that. Gary had been most relieved to tell Deborah, and it had been good fun at first, to think of themselves as poor. Of course it would be only until Deborah was twenty-one, and then they would be wealthier than ever. Until Deborah was twenty-one—it had run like a thread of song through everything they did, through all the little subterfuges to keep Grandmother from knowing, through the hard work, the gardening, the building of the smoke house to cure venison and fish for the larder, the cutting down and making over of Grandmother's old clothes for Deborah, the enlarging of Grandfather's things for Gary.

And then, suddenly, Deborah was twenty and a half.

Twenty and a half, and marriage was something unknown and frightening. What was marriage? Why did a girl have to marry a man, a young man she had never seen, and . . . well, when she did marry him, what happened? Grandmother wouldn't explain. She said Stuart was a gentleman, and anything Deborah didn't quite understand, he would explain to her. But it wasn't enough. And, for the first time in her life, Deborah couldn't ask Gary. Gary knew she didn't know, and he knew she was beginning to feel terrified and cold inside about it. And his kind old face was lined and heavy, and his eyes followed her about with misery and worry. They talked about love. Well, that was easy. Deborah loved Grandmother dearly, her sweet, fragile old face, her tender hands, her soft gentle smile. She would have done anything for Grandmother. But it wasn't like that; Grandmother had said so herself, blushing furiously. She said the love a woman had for her husband was something quite different, stronger, more wonderful.

Stuart Graham was writing to her now. He had begun when she was twenty, and over the first letter Gary had shaken his head and said it sounded very sudden, somehow; and over the second he said the fellow seemed to want to know an awful lot about what kind of investments Grandfather had left his money in. Gary had gone so far as to talk that over with Grandmother, and she had said quietly that of course the dear boy was interested, since he would so soon have control of the estate; and that the Grahams had far more money than themselves and always had. Gary couldn't suggest to her, of course, that the Grahams might not have their money any longer. He and Deborah talked it over, and Deborah had said, with those cold fingers at her heart and a smile on her lips, that it didn't matter whether Stuart had any money or not, that surely she had enough for two, and the situation was that if she didn't marry him, poor or not poor, there wouldn't be anything for any of them. The time was desperate. Gary said miserably that they wouldn't be able to pay the taxes on the only home they had, if they didn't get some money soon. So of course there was nothing to do but go through with it.

And then the very worst thing of all happened. For some reason that Grandmother couldn't understand, except that since a Graham had done it there must be a reason and a good one, Stuart had joined the navy two or three years ago. And now something had occurred, something he didn't quite explain. As a result, he was not going to be able to leave his ship by Deborah's twenty-first birthday.

For a few days, Gary and Grandmother and Deborah were thrown into consternation; and although for a moment when his letter first came, Deborah had run out and hugged a tree for sheer joy, she had seen in no time that something had to be done. Stuart had a plan. He had gone on to explain that, fortunately enough, his ship would be with the rest of the Pacific fleet, anchored in Golden Gate harbor in San Francisco bay; and that it would be quite simple after all. Deborah could come down and meet him in San Francisco, and they could be married there.

Quite simple for Stuart, perhaps, but a most upsetting idea for Deborah and Grandmother and Gary. Obviously, if Deborah went, she must go alone; since Grandmother could not possibly go, and Gary could not possibly leave her. And Deborah had been so little in the world; she had never traveled anywhere alone. The world was a huge noisy whirling place, and she had lived always in the quiet and peace of the mountains. Still, it was only a matter of a trip to San Francisco; because, once there, she could go directly to the hotel Grandmother knew about, the hotel at which they had stayed years ago; and from the hotel she could go to Mr. Holworthy's office where Stuart would meet her. Stuart was a Graham, and a gentleman, and as soon as she met him her troubles would be over, for he would tell her everything she needed to know.

This was what Grandmother said, and outwardly Deborah assented; but to her he was really a man and a stranger, and in her heart was a deadly terror of marriage and whatever it might mean, of meeting this strange man and being with him, being alone with him.

Hello Everybody!

"The Thin Edge of Doom"

By FLOYD GIBBONS
Famous Headline Hunter

FREDERICK PRESNOILE of New York city walks away with the blue ribbon today, with a yarn that will curdle your blood, make your hair stand up, and bring you up out of bed in the middle of the night in a cold sweat. And Fred's adventure is another one of those yarns that goes to show how the real hot adventures don't come to the birds you'd expect them to come to.

Fred served as a soldier with the British army in France and Belgium. He got himself into many a tight spot during the war. But the big adventure of his career came to him while he was working at the comparatively peaceful job of medical technician.

It was on September 9, 1932, that Fred received a call from a prominent physician summoning him to a case in an apartment building on Park avenue. When Fred got there he was met by a woman, the widow of a wealthy New York merchant, who told him that her son had been suffering from a mental disorder and needed to be taken care of.

Patient Had Homicidal Tendencies.

The woman took Fred to her son's room. He was sitting by a window, looking out at the street. He paid no attention to Fred, and when Fred spoke to him he got no reply but a vague mumble and a furtive look.

Fred pretended to be interested in things around the room. He sort of hoped the young fellow might respond to that sort of treatment. But the lad just sat in his chair and sulked, and paid no attention to Fred at all.

About six-thirty that evening the doctor arrived. He looked over his patient, and then he warned Fred to watch him closely. "He's developing homicidal tendencies," the Doc said, "and it's hard to tell what he'll do. But he may become dangerous at any minute." So Fred decided he'd have to watch his step that night.

The evening wore on—and still the young fellow sulked. About midnight Fred persuaded him to go to bed. A cot had been set up in the room for Fred, but before he lay down on it he locked the door from the inside and put the key in his pocket. He waited until he was sure his patient was asleep, and then he lay down himself.

That Doze Was Almost Fatal.

Says Fred: "I was very tired, having just finished a strenuous case that same morning, and I must have dozed off. That doze nearly cost me my life. I awoke suddenly with a nameless feeling that all was not well, and there, not two feet from the foot of my cot, creeping toward me, was my patient."

Fred says no words that he knows could describe the demoniacal fury of the young lad's distorted features. "And," he says, "in his right hand was an OPEN RAZOR. To say that I went cold with horror wouldn't be telling the half of it. But that feeling only lasted a second or two. Then I managed to pull myself together again.

"The young fellow must have sensed that I was awake, for with a bound he was at my side. His arm went up and started to come down again. He meant to decapitate me with that razor. But my left hand shot out and seized his right, and I got a death grip on his wrist to stop the murderous swing."

But now the madman's left hand was reaching for Fred's throat, and there in that locked room began a terrible battle. The young fellow fought with all of a maniac's superhuman strength. He was armed with a razor, and Fred thought that sure enough this was going to be his finish. Still he struggled, and still the maniac fought on.

Nearly Split by the Razor.

"He made no sound," Fred says, "but kept spitting in my face as though to blind me. Finally, with a furious heave, he flung me to the floor and tore loose his right arm—the one with the razor in it. The arm went up, and I could see the razor gleam in the light that filtered in through the window. Emitting a grunting sound like a woodchopper swinging an axe on a block of wood he brought that razor down to split me in two."

And then, something else happened.

Fred says it's a strange thing, the way a man's mind and body will co-ordinate in a moment of stress. He put every ounce of strength he had into one great effort of pitching himself away—out from under that descending razor. He rolled violently to one side, and as he did, his right hand landed on one of his shoes.

Fred doesn't even remember thinking his next move out. He thinks he must have acted almost entirely by instinct. But he clutched at the shoe as a drowning man would a straw, sprang to his feet, whirled around and swung the heel at the mad young fellow's temple.

He did that all in one motion—and did it so swiftly that it was all over before his mind half caught up with what he was doing. The heel of the shoe landed—right where Fred wanted it to land. The young fellow slumped to the floor, and lay still.

Fred struck him again with that shoe. He looked as though the first blow had knocked him unconscious, but he might have been playing possum, and Fred wasn't taking any chances. And then the fight was over:

Fred stripped the sheets from the young fellow's bed and tied him hand and foot. He unlocked the door, and there, outside were the young lad's mother and the maid, both of them almost frantic. They had heard the sounds of the struggle but couldn't get through the locked door.

They took the young fellow to a sanitarium the next day. Fred never found out how he managed to get hold of that razor. Fred grabbed that razor, by the way, and kept it for a souvenir of a ghastly night's experience.

But I'll bet a lot of money he doesn't shave with it.

Early Pueblo People Had Their Balanced Rations

At a time when our own Nordic ancestors were living chiefly on half-cooked or raw meat, ignoring the necessity of eating plenty of spinach and fresh fruit to make them red-blooded and strong, the Pueblo people knew all about balanced rations and were thriving on a variety of delicious foods, declares a writer in the New York Times.

Yellow corn was the staple diet; yucca fruit was utilized, wild honey and sweet saps were excellent substitutes for sugar, and beans were so important as a ration that the Spanish name for bean, "frijoles," persists today in the name given to one of the most famous cliff-dweller ruins of New Mexico — Frijoles Canyon, in Bandelier National Monument, some seventy miles beyond Santa Fe. There were also squashes, edible gourds, bulbs of the Mariposa lily, and other roots; berries, pinon nuts, and the seeds of certain grasses which were ground into meal in the stone metates, or grinding basins of hollowed stone, pounded with a stone pestle or manos.

For salt, to be sure, the Pueblo dweller had to travel long distances, securing it through mining or barter. Even today the scarcity of salt in some of these remote Pueblo villages is the occasion for seasonal trips to distant points for supplies of the mineral.

Ideals of a Nation

The strength and greatness of a nation do not lie in the sinews of its people, nor in the money bags of its traders, nor in the glibness of its orators, but in the devotion of its citizens to a lofty ideal of public and private duty, in the love for all that is true and good and beautiful, and the hatred of all that is false, evil, mean and ugly; in their strenuous pursuit of knowledge, and their readiness to apply it to the making of life larger, fuller and happier for all.

All Gloversville Makes Gloves

In Gloversville, New York, the art of making gloves is a community proposition. In one factory, where handmade gloves are manufactured exactly as they were a hundred years ago, three of the best sewers of gloves are the wife of the mayor of the town, and the captain of police and his wife. The making of one glove involves no less than 74 different steps

Garden Club May Be Formed Friday

On Friday evening, April 16, a meeting will be held at the Court House, Warren, for the purpose of discussing the organization of garden clubs or Horticultural Society in Warren and other communities of Marshall County.

There is a big field in this county for activities of such clubs, which will add to the beauty of communities and to the joys of living to its residents and people from outside.

Such an organization can be a leader in public improvements in building up appreciation of much beauty in public and home living conditions.

There are so many activities a garden club may undertake that it is difficult to mention many of them. Civic improvements, assisting 4-H clubs in Home Beautification studying better garden crops and practice, holding local flower shows, are but a few.

With the above ideas in mind, the agricultural extension office has arranged this meeting at which Mr. T. L. Aamodt, president of the Minnesota Horticultural Society will speak.

Everyone, interested in Civil and Home grounds improvements, is invited to attend this meeting, and if a garden club is desired by those present, to take part in the organization.

Men's Club To Be Formed

At the meeting of the Church council of the Nazareth Lutheran church last Friday evening, the possibility of organizing a Men's Club was discussed. It was decided to call a meeting of all the men who might be interested, on Monday evening, April 26, for the purpose of seeing how many are interested and if enough are interested, to organize at this time. All the men of Holt and surrounding community are invited to come to this meeting. Attendance at this meeting will not obligate anyone to become a member if he does not wish to. It is merely to find out if we want an organization of this kind. Since this is only a mass meeting, no special program is being prepared. Coffee and doughnuts will be served free to those who wish to come.

Rev. Hanson left Sunday evening for Milan to visit his mother who has been ill this winter.

Life Of Mrs. Soren Moe

Anne Bertha Moen was born on November 29, 1866, in Bamle Kragers, Norway, where she grew into womanhood on her parents farm.

On September 17, 1887, she was united in marriage to Soren Moe and they lived in Norway for four years. Before they immigrated to America in 1891, two children were born to them. The family resided for six years in Grafton, N. Dak. In 1897 they moved to what is now Agder township, Marshall County, and homesteaded a farm where she lived until her death which occured at 6:45 o'clock, Friday evening, April 2nd, as a result of heart failure. At the time of her death, she was 70 years, 4 months and 8 days old.

She leaves to mourn her departure, her faithful husband, Soren Moe; one step-son and five sons, Engebret, Simon and Oscar of Duluth; Halvor of Ada; Manvel and Arthur at home; four daughters, Mrs. Clarence O. Larson, Mrs. L. M. Larson, Mrs. Hans Langlie and Mrs. Edwin Anderson all of this vicinity. Two sisters, Mrs. Jens Gullickson of Granite Falls, Minn., and Mette Moen of Norway; 32 grandchildren; and a host of other relatives and friends. One daughter Marie preceeded her in death in 1914.

She was always active and in the best of health until a year ago when she was suddenly taken ill and spent one week in the hospital in Thief River Falls. She regained her strength again and was quite well until this winter when she was again taken to the hospital where she remained two weeks. She came home March 23rd. and appeared to be improving steadily, and her family was again rejoicing at having mother home again when she suddenly was taken into eternity without a moments warning.

She will always be remembered as a Christian mother who took special pride in her home and work and will be greatly missed in the family circle as well as in the church and Ladies' Aid where she was an active member

Funeral services were conducted on Wednesday afternoon from the Satersdal Lutheran Church with Rev. Reinhart G. Pederson officiating. Interment was made in the church cemetery She was carried to her final resting place by her six sons.

Out of town relatives to attend the funeral were: Mr. and Mrs. Simon Moe; Oscar Moe and daughter, Merle; and Engebret Moe of Duluth; Halvor Moe and daughters, Wilma and Mary of Ada; Mrs. Karen Knutson of Superior Wis.; Mrs. Herman Dahl, Mrs. Marie Settingsgard, Mrs. Annie Brye, Miss Gunda Moe and Henry Moe of Grafton, N. Dak.

Don't Neglect Them!

Nature designed the kidneys to do a marvelous job. Their task is to keep the flowing blood stream free of an excess of toxic impurities. The act of living—life itself—is constantly producing waste matter the kidneys must remove from the blood if good health is to endure.

When the kidneys fail to function as Nature intended, there is retention of waste that may cause body-wide distress. One may suffer nagging backache, persistent headache, attacks of dizziness, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes—feel tired, nervous, all worn out.

Frequent, scanty or burning passages may be further evidence of kidney or bladder disturbance.

The recognized and proper treatment is a diuretic medicine to help the kidneys get rid of excess poisonous body waste. Use Doan's Pills. They have had more than forty years of public approval. Are endorsed the country over. Insist on Doan's. Sold at all drug stores.

SYNOPSIS

Bryn (James Brynildson III), a tall bronzed young man of wealth, and his chum, Tubby Forbes, are discussing Bryn's coming marriage. Tubby believes it a scheme to get Bryn's wealth from him. Should the girl, Deborah, whom Bryn had met at the office of his attorney, Ted Holworthy, marry Stuart Graham before her twenty-first birthday, she will inherit a vast fortune from her grandfather. Stuart had greatly displeased Deborah, who refuses to marry him. Bryn, posing as an unemployed engineer, offers to marry Deborah, as Stuart, for $50,000, they not to live as man and wife. Twenty-three years previous, Anne Larned had eloped with an adventurer on the day set for her wedding to Courtney Graham. Two days after the birth of her daughter, Anne died. Shortly after, the father died. The Larneds, grandparents, took the child with them to Oregon where, without child companions, Deborah grew up. To safeguard her from some fortune hunter, her grandfather had arranged for her to marry Stuart, son of Courtney Graham, when of age, believing the alliance would be a happy one. When Deborah was fifteen, her grandfather died. Securities had been set aside to keep the family, but a market crash left scarcely enough for them to live on. This was unknown to Deborah's grandmother, an invalid, Gary, a servant, managing the finances. At twenty, the thought of marriage greatly frightens Deborah. It had been planned that Deborah meet Stuart in Frisco, where they were to be married.

There was nothing to be done. She had to go. She had to be married. They were in such trouble about money, she and Gary, that there was scarcely enough to buy her ticket to San Francisco, and when it came to her costume for the journey the problem was dreadful. Grandmother had forgotten about clothes for years. She was horrified when they came to contemplate Deborah's wardrobe. She wanted to write immediately to Boston and have a large selection of articles sent out, but Deborah convinced her that there was no time, and that they would have to manage with what was in the house. So they made a traveling costume from one of Grandmother's. It was quiet and reserved, although perhaps the lines were not such as a professional dressmaker would have put into it. It would serve.

The dress was made of brown cloth, very neat and plain. A hat was rather a problem, but they evolved one finally, a neat small black turban with a modest cluster of velvet pansies on one side. Grandmother said the hat was perhaps a little old-fashioned, but she said that Deborah was far too pretty to travel alone dressed too attractively. She cried when she said it, and warned Deborah again of the danger of speaking to strangers.

Grandmother sent only one other dress with Deborah; her own wedding dress. When they tried it on, it fitted perfectly. Deborah looked at herself in the glass, and then quickly back at Grandmother, with dark startled eyes.

"It's . . . it's . . ." she touched the neck.

"It is for your husband, my darling," Grandmother said gently, and Deborah's blood was cold again in her veins.

CHAPTER II

Tubby had finally finished dressing, and now, after a hurried trip across the city in Bryn's roadster, they stood waiting in the big parlor of one of the old and eminently respectable hotels. Age had not added to its prestige; it had gained nothing, through the passage of years, save a few extra layers of dust in the interiors of the sagging red plush chairs, a few more cracks in the elaborately frescoed plaster walls, a few more worn places in the thin carpet. Tubby, hands in pockets, stared unseeingly at the candle sconces on the wall, fitted now with weary electric bulbs which gave out barely enough light to disclose the dangling crystal ornaments on the sconces themselves.

The grandfather clock in the corner ticked slowly.

"You're crazy," Bryn murmured, and took out his watch.

"Me?" Tubby asked in amazement and sat down in a comfortable chair.

"The clock. It's slow. My watch says ten minutes to nine."

"Oh. So you were talking to the clock?"

"Merely a slip."

"Slip is right," Tubby muttered. "Talking to clocks!" Tubby went so far as to say that if Bryn, at the age of six, had not fallen upon him violently one day as they rolled off a roof together, he would not have bitten the end off his tongue and so begun a lisp which would endure to his dying day.

"Thlip ith right," Bryn repeated absently to himself. "Talkingh to clockth."

"Go to hell," Tubby said bitterly. He folded his hands before him.

There was a long silence.

"Bryn," Tubby said abruptly, and stopped.

"Tubby," Bryn answered politely.

"Bryn, what are you doing it for?"

"There isn't any reason why I shouldn't do it."

"Well," Tubby exploded, "you're not getting anything out of it. That's what I mean. You're getting into an awful mix-up with all kinds of possible consequences, and you're not getting anything out of it."

"Consequences?"

Tubby still sat in the big chair and considered, his blue eyes on Bryn's gray ones. "Pilar, for one. You'd make a very nice couple. That is . . ."

"Pilar would make a nice couple with anybody. And we've settled about her, so don't go back over that again, Tubby. Only there's a suggestion I'd like to make. If I were you I wouldn't rush over to Pilar's tonight right after the ceremony, because if you were to get down on your knees in my pants there would certainly be a catastrophe."

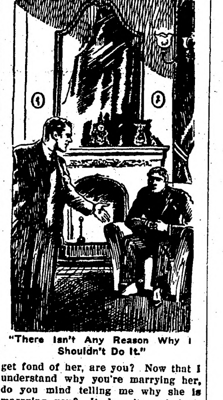
He stopped in front of the grandfather clock and gazed earnestly into its dingy face until Tubby had stopped making his spluttering noises. There was another long silence. Seven minutes to nine.

"What about this sailor, this Graham fellow?" Tubby demanded abruptly. "Do you think he's going to let any man crack him in the jaw and then marry his girl without doing anything about it? What about him?"

"Oh, he's all right," Bryn said lazily. "His enlisted time doesn't expire for two months. And he isn't much to worry over, anyway."

"Oh, Lord," Tubby said prayerfully, and put his head in his hands. Bryn went over and sat down beside him. He tweaked the yellow lock. "The whole trouble with you, Tubby, is that you're one of these sermons-in-stones people. I mean, you can't help looking for trouble. Why can't you take a thing at its face value and stop worrying? All that's happening is that I'm lending my name and my charming personality . . . because I have to win over the grandmother, too, perhaps I forgot to mention it . . . for a year. What's a year? The last pair of elephant tusks I brought home cost me a year, and I've been sick of the darn things for a long time. After all, an elephant tusk is not exactly a thing a man wants to look at more than two or three times a day, and it isn't a thing you ever get really fond of and like to cherish, you know."

Tubby raised his head. "Oh," he said ominously. "So you're planning to cherish this Deborah woman and get fond of her, are you? Now that I understand why you're marrying her, do you mind telling me why she is marrying you? It doesn't work both ways, you know. It couldn't be, even if it's what I'm beginning to think it might be."



"There Isn't Any Reason Why I Shouldn't Do It."

"But I told you why she's marrying me," Bryn said kindly. "I really explained it very nicely. She's marrying me to get a million dollars, one year from today when the conditions of the will are fulfilled and when her grandmother is convinced that I am no fortune-hunter and that I am a steady going young gentleman with no bad habits and the ability to make Deborah happy."

"Oh, no, she isn't," Tubby contradicted.

"Isn't she?"

Tubby straightened. He put his hand on Bryn's arm. "Look here, Bryn," he said, "what's the use of your trying to hold out on me? Why don't you come across with the whole story? I know what it is, anyway. It's another of those crazy quixotic notions of yours. What are you trying to put over now?"

"Nothing."

"You lie. The girl can't be marrying you to get her grandfather's money, because you're not Stuart Graham, and you said yourself that the will stated specifically that unless she married Graham and Graham only, on or before her birthday — today — she wouldn't get the money. Didn't you? And you're not Graham."

"Well," Bryn said at last, "not specifically. Not very specifically. I've read quite a few legal documents . . . this was a ferociously legal document, Tub, with a lot of whereases and inas-muchases and party-of-the-second-parts, and that kind of thing. If Deborah's grandfather hadn't told me what it was that he intended, I wouldn't have been too sure."

"But is it ambiguous, after all the fuss? Why make a will like that and leave it ambiguous? Can the girl get around it? Marry anybody at all and still get the money?"

(TO BE CONTINUED)

Household Questions

Use Baking Sheets — Baking powder biscuits and cookies rise better and brown more evenly on baking sheets than they do in pans.

* * *

To Remove a Tight Lid—Tie a piece of string round the tin two or three times, just below the lid; then push a pencil between the string and the tin, twist the pencil over, and the resulting pressure will release the lid.

* * *

Shining Saucepans—Aluminum saucepans that have become discolored inside can be made to look like new by boiling in them water to which a tablespoonful of vinegar and some apple parings or lemon rinds have been added.

* * *

Useful Velvet—If you are making anything of velvet do not throw away the pieces of material left over. Save them for using as polishers for your black-leaded stoves and for your shoes. You'll get a real mirror-like shine on both if you rub them with velvet after the usual polish has been applied.

* * *

Cleaning Paintwork — Glossy paintwork should never be washed with soap and water, as it usually leaves a smeary surface. A teaspoonful of turpentine in warm water will make the cleaning a simple matter and will not scratch the paint.

* * *

A Supper Special—One cup left-over cooked vegetables, four eggs, half-teaspoonful salt, dash of pepper, half-cup grated cheese. Break the eggs and beat the yolks and whites together. Stir in the vegetables. Add pepper and salt. Put in greased baking dish. Cover with grated cheese and bake in hot oven ten minutes.

GROUND GRIP TIRES GIVE MORE TRACTION

THE patented scientific arrangement and spacing of the deep, rugged bars of the tread make this tire self-cleaning. It will not clog or ball up, thus providing clean traction with every turn of the wheel. The deep rugged tread is held inseparably to the cord body because every cotton fiber in every cord has been soaked in pure liquid rubber by the Firestone Patented Process of Gum-Dipping. This gives the tire much greater strength to resist the strains of the extra "pull."

Ground Grip Tires save 25 per cent in time and 25 per cent in fuel. They give more traction and drawbar pull — ride easier and cut down repair bills. You can save time and money by equipping your tractors, trucks and farm implements with Ground Grip Tires. ### SYNOPSIS

The Duke, a pleasant, likable youth of twenty-three, jobless and broke, enters an unoccupied summer home in Southampton, seeking shelter from a terrific rain storm. He makes himself at home. Six years ago his father had died in China, leaving the lad, Barry Gilbert, to fight his way back to the States. He did not recollect ever having had a mother. Dozing at the fireside, he is startled by the arrival of a butler, Willetts; a chauffeur, Evans; a cook and a maid. He learns that the son of the owner of the house, Jack Ridder, whom the servants had never seen, is expected. He decides to bluff it out.

"I hope not," the Duke replied, grinning broadly, and, seeing that grin, the four servants smiled, too—plainly surprised at the master's good humor.

"This is Evans, sir," the butler continued. "This is Mrs. Mulligan. Cook, sir. And Annie Jeffers, the parlor maid. If you don't mind, sir, I'll get them set, and then I'll come upstairs to report."

"Fine!" said the Duke, calculating that five minutes would get him into his clothes, and out the front door.

He was climbing the steps again when Willetts called.

"I never thought, sir. Your bed isn't made. I'll get the linen out, and have Annie up there right away. You'll want a good fire in your room to dry things out."

"I've got a fire in the library," the Duke replied. "Don't hurry. I'm very comfortable."

They did hurry. He had scarcely got his trousers from under the mattress when Annie appeared, just as he had seen her in the hall, and with a small load of immaculate sheets and pillow cases.

"Mr. Evans is lighting the furnace," she said. "The house is that cold. It's an oil-burner, Mr. Willetts says. I wonder you didn't think of it. But, of course, you're a stranger here, too."

"A stranger!" What did she mean by that? Where had be been, he wondered? Evidently, not home, at any rate. So that was why Willetts hadn't known he wasn't Mr. Ridder. Was Willetts new? The girl was on her knees at the hearth, and the Duke ventured half a question.

"Willetts isn't a stranger?"

"Of course not," Annie replied. "Nor Mr. Evans. Just Mrs. Mulligan and me. We was taken on when Madam and Mr. Ridder expected to spend the summer here, and we'd've been let out, I guess, when they decided to go to Germany, if it hadn't been for your coming back."

"I picked just the right minute, didn't I?" grinned the Duke.

"And "You sure did!" grinned the parlor maid, spreading the linen over the arms of two chairs.

It was an amusing conversation, but it had been too long. Returning to the library, trousers still in hand, Barry Gilbert encountered the ubiquitous Willetts. "I'll take those, sir," said the butler, taking them.

"Oh, never mind!"

"They'll need pressing."

"I'll need them."

"They'll be ready for you in the morning," Willetts said, with a note of finality. "Did you bring any pyjamas, sir?"

Any lie would do for now.

"Yes," answered the Duke, "but, like an idiot, I checked my suit-case, and God knows what happened to the check!"

"I'll get you a pair of your father's," Willetts volunteered. "You're very much of a size." He was taking stock of the new master. "Look like your father, if you don't mind my saying so, sir. Same figure. Same kind of face, only kinder, if you don't mind my saying so, sir."

The Duke didn't mind. It was all "a lucky break," only — how long would it last? "Mustn't over-play my luck," thought the Duke. But the real Mr. Ridder "wasn't coming until tomorrow." Why make a break for it tonight? The storm was roaring, and throwing buckets of water against the windows.

The butler had gone into the bedroom, and returned with a pair of purple silk pyjamas.

"Anything else, sir?"

"No, thanks."

"I'll be leaving you then. There's a lot to do—getting the rooms ready for cook and the maid. They've never been here before. Don't know their way about. Evans don't neither. What time breakfast, sir?"

"Oh, say eight o'clock."

"Right, sir. Good night, sir," said the butler, bowing himself out.

"Easy!" thought the Duke, standing before the fire, with the purple pyjamas in his hand. "Too easy! Too damned easy! There's a catch in it somewhere!"

Willetts implied that he had been with the family some time. Why had he never seen the son? Or even a picture of him? Why was he so willing to accept a stranger in the house at his own word—practically without question? Why did he take those trousers? "I'm trapped," mused the Duke, "or else—"

Or else what?

"Or else he's no more a butler than I am Mr. Ridder. How do I know what he is? There's a lot of mighty valuable junk in this house."

It was with that thought in his mind, and himself imagined in a new and exciting role, that His Grace of Hollywood finally turned the other cheek on an Irish linen pillow slip, and dropped off to sleep.

The trousers were beside his bed when he awoke.

And all that cinema nonsense had evaporated from his mind.

Just "a lucky break." A good night's rest in a warm, dry house, whose owners had suddenly dashed off to Europe, leaving the establishment to a son who happened to be unknown to the servants.

"If I belonged in a house like this—"

He squared his shoulders, and sauntered down the carpeted stairs. No need of finishing the sentence. Already, he felt a new dignity; a new, stiffening self-respect. The trousers were neatly pressed, and "Good morning, sir," said the butler, as he entered the breakfast room.

There was nothing "make shift" about the meal. Evans had been to town for cream, and bacon, and bread, and the Duke's courage rose with every sip of the steaming coffee.

"What's this?" he inquired, his eye falling up an envelope at his plate.

"A letter for your mother, sir," Willetts replied. "It came after she'd left the hotel, and Evans got it when he went back for some things he was to bring out here. He forgot it last night, sir. Mrs. Ridder expected some mail from the employment agency, and places like that. She said you was to open it, sir."

Barry hesitated.

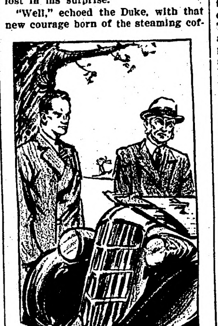
He could feel a chilly something in the butler's gaze.

Sooner than return the gaze, or evade it, he opened the envelope.

A hundred dollar bill dropped out.

"Well, sir!" exclaimed the butler, any doubts he may have entertained lost in his surprise.

"Well," echoed the Duke, with that new courage born of the steaming coffee. "Well, and likewise good. I can use this."



"It's Got to Go," Fumed the White-Haired Gentleman.

"Yes, sir," said the butler. "A little more coffee, sir?"

"Thank you," assented the Duke. "And just one more piece of toast."

Alone in the cheerful breakfast room, with the cheerful sunshine streaming down outside, he read the letter.

"Dear Mother:

I'm returning the money. I can't keep it, and I can't go to Southampton. I'm sending this special delivery, so you'll have time to get rid of the servants, if you decide not to open the house. For your sake, I hope father improves at Bad Nauheim, but I don't want anything that comes from him, and I sha'n't write again. Thanks, all the same. John."

The Duke picked up the envelope again.

It had been posted the previous morning in New York, and there was no special delivery stamp.

"Well," he remarked; "Santa Claus is certainly worked overtime for me!"

Back with the toast and coffee, Willetts inquired, "Anything important, sir?"

"The letter?" asked the Duke, as though that had been farthest from his present thoughts. "No. I'll send it to Bad Nauheim when I write, and keep the money until my mother returns."

"What time shall you want the car, sir?"

"The car?"

"For luncheon, sir. It's a fairish long walk to the village."

His Grace reflected. It was a long walk to the village. It was an even longer walk to Montauk Point. And, apparently, there was no possibility of overplaying his luck. Why should not he ride to Montauk in comfort—or, at least, to within a few miles of Montauk — and disappear there, instead of at Southampton?

"I might take a drive," he said.

Out of sight of the house, he took the precaution of burning that letter from "John." The truth was that the Duke's uneasiness over that hundred had nothing to do with the fear of being caught. He had never stolen anything before. "I'll return that money from Montauk," mused the Duke. "I don't want to be booked for robbing the mails."

Life had never been dull for him —or for his father. "Keep moving"—that was the old man's slogan. And that was all he ever kept. Barry's memories began in Pittsburg. Stranded, Francis Gilbert had tutored there. "Spoiling good longshoremen," he called it, "because their papas are rich." From one of the longshoremen, Barry had discovered that he should have a mother. The old man had never mentioned it, so his son raised the question. "I lost her," his father said.

"How?"

"In Algiers. You were born there."

It was years before Barry was old enough to put the two things together. "Did she die when I was born?" he asked then, and got no answer. This was in San Sebastian, where the old man worked for an engineering concern. Soon afterward, they pushed on to England, and short-lived prosperity. Barry went to school, for the first time, and found that he had learned more from his father than the other lads from their professors. That was fortunate, because the schooling lasted only a year before Barry—fifteen now—was taken to India. "I can't stand counting houses," his father had told him. "They've given us a berth in Calcutta."

It wasn't an upper berth, and it was in another counting house. "I met a fellow today," the elder Gilbert announced, "who's got something to do with the diamond mines. I think we'll go to Johannesburg." They didn't, because, a week later, the old man found another friend who suggested Manila. From there, it was only a step to Canton, and the tea business, and a shorter step to Hong Kong, where Francis Gilbert came home one night with a fever, and died the next morning.

Barry had begged a clerkship in Hong Kong, and then worked his way to San Francisco. On the boat was a movie director. "You've got a great smile," he told the youngster. "I think I can use you." Hollywood, then, and one studio after another. Youth, and looks, and the ingratiating grin helped a lot there. And Barry learned a lot, too. How to wear clothes, and how gentlemen behaved—or Hollywood thought they behaved—in a drawing room. He was earning two hundred dollars a week, sometimes, when a wallet vanished from a coat thrown over a table "in the set." The Duke knew who took it. She was a poor little thing, though, and desperate, and His Grace kept his mouth shut. They couldn't pin it on him, he said, and they didn't, but there were no jobs after that.

And so he'd come East. Ankle-deep in the sand, that morning at Southampton, he kept thinking of the letter he'd just burned. And of his own mother. He had missed her all through his childhood, watching the other boys with their mothers, or, at school in England, getting ready to go home to them. "I lost her," the old man had said, and never mentioned the matter again. Had she died in Algiers, in childbirth, or merely grown weary of wandering, and decided to stay somewhere with someone? "I'd like to find her," the Duke thought.

At noon Evans brought the car.

"Do you know where we're going?" asked the Duke.

"Yes. I'm taking you for a ride."

Almost surly, thought the Duke. And it had a sinister sound, that phrase.

"You want to get lunch, don't you?" the chauffeur added, quickly.

"I want to see the end of the island. We can eat anywhere."

The Duke sank back into the cushioned seat. It gave him a curious sense of importance — being driven like this. Along the highway they sped.

The car was slowing down now, and, looking ahead, His Grace saw another limousine drawn up at the side of the road. Evans threw out the clutch, and then put his foot on the brake.

A husky young fellow in uniform was standing in front of the other car. Beside him was a spare, white-haired gentleman. And, framed in the car's doorway, ready to alight, stood a pretty girl.

"Stop," said the Duke, quite supererogatorily, since they had stopped.

She was the prettiest girl he had ever seen, the Duke decided. He had made the same decision many times before, but this time he felt it would be final. Tall and slim and dark, dressed in an ensemble of hunter's-green tweed, with a top coat to match, and a tiny felt hat perched upon her sleek black hair, she looked, somehow, like a thing turned out by an entirely perfect machine—trim, and polished, and built for speed. Her eyes were gray, the Duke was to discover later, and wide, and a little cold. Her nose was a straight line from her forehead, and her lips were bright red against the pale ivory of her face.

"Can I do anything for you?" inquired the Duke.

He was standing before her now, and her glance took him in, calmly, appraisingly, before she answered, "No, thanks."

And with that, Barry felt, she erased him from the landscape.

"Yes, you can," said the white-haired gentleman. "That is, if either of you knows anything about a car. My chauffeur doesn't."

"We'll be glad to try," the Duke said, cordially. "Have a look at it, will you, Evans?"

Sullenly, Evans walked over to the open hood.

"It's the ignition," the other chauffeur told him.

"Start her up."

"She won't start."

The two men began fussing with the engine.

"It's got to go," fumed the white-haired gentleman. "I haven't had a bite since breakfast, and I'm due in New York at five o'clock."

"Hungry myself," said the Duke. "Where did you mean to eat?"

Dour "Scottie" Wins Right to Bark in Own Back Yard

Megs, pudgy and be-whiskered Scottish terrier, "conducted herself as a perfect lady" in the eyes of Common Pleas Judge Samuel Silbert of Cleveland, and escaped an injunction against a few "yips" in her own back yard. A neighbor in the fashionable Edgewater drive neighborhood, Mrs. Florence Abel, asked an injunction against the dog's "disturbing the peace in the night," pleading aggravation of a serious nervous heart ailment.

The Scottie came into court on a leash. She sat quietly in the lap of her mistress, Miss Betty Stinchcomb, eighteen, during the hearing. Judge Silbert, in denying the injunction, said "the dog conducted herself as a perfect lady in court. She seems inclined to be dull. She is inoffensive and quiet. In fact, she doesn't amount to much."

By VIRGINIA VALE

A PICTURE that will endear itself to every dog lover in the world and every humanitarian, based on that heart-warming institution known as "The Seeing Eye," is planned by Warner Brothers. As you probably know, "The Seeing Eye" is a school at Morristown, N. J., supported by public subscription which trains police dogs to lead blind men.

Started soon after the war by a Mrs. Eustis who had seen what wonderful work was done in Switzerland by giving blind men dog companions, "The Seeing Eye" has trained hundreds of dogs, who have completely changed the lives of their formerly-helpless masters. The dogs lead their men through traffic tangles with perfect safety—but better even than that, provide understanding companionship.

Far away in Boston making personal appearances, the Ritz Brothers heard that the Twentieth Century-Fox studio planned to separate them, putting brother Jim into "Last Year's Kisses" with Alice Faye, Tony Martin, Don Ameche and others. They complained by telegram, they howled over long-distance telephone, they objected with such embittered frenzy that the studio had to give in. All three Ritz Brothers will appear in the picture. The appearance of Alice Faye with the boys should add to the fun of the picture.

Gertrude Niesen's first song number in "Top of the Town" is "Where Are You," her lucky number. Jimmy McHugh and Harold Adamson wrote it for her three years ago, to use when auditioning for a big commercial radio program. She got the job. Last fall while in Hollywood for a vacation after a strenuous stretch on the radio, she sang it at a party and was immediately offered a screen contract by producers present.

While producers of "Gone With the Wind" are still arguing over who should play the leading roles, Paramount is stealing a march on them. They have bought a story called "Gettysburg" which has the same setting and similar characters and are putting it into production at once.

As a fitting salute to Spring, Warner Brothers have released "The King and the Chorus Girl" and United Artists have put out "History Is Made at Night." They are both giddy and romantic and have set everyone to arguing over who is the greater matinee idol, Fernand Gravet or Charles Boyer. They are both grand romantic heroes. "The King and the Chorus Girl" is something of a nine-days wonder because it is a Warner Brothers musical without a big production number to interrupt the gaiety. And "History Is Made at Night" is completely baffling because it mixes spectacular scenes and grim tragedy with farcical situations.

Talent scouts from the motion-picture studios are suspected of doing their hunting nowadays in nurseries, for suddenly all Hollywood is in a dither over child prodigies. If you heard Betty Jaynes, the fifteen-year-old opera star on Bing Crosby's program a few weeks ago, just before she started work for Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, you may have marveled at her talent. She is practically middle-aged, though, compared to their newest discovery, for the new contract player is Suzanne Larson, aged ten, who will be featured in a musical, "B Above High C" which gives you an idea of her voice range.

FLASH! MELVIN PURVIS FORMER ACE G-MAN FORMS NEW CORPS OF SECRET OPERATORS!
INVITES ALL BOYS AND GIRLS TO JOIN HIS NEW LAW-AND-ORDER PATROL!

MELVIN PURVIS, former ace G-Man who founded the Junior G-Man Corps, has formed a great new organization—Melvin Purvis' Law-and-Order Patrol. Members are SECRET OPERATORS. They have special codes, passwords, and special equipment. Below is a "candid camera" snapshot of a squad of Secret Operators who have a special problem . . .

LOOK HERE, TEDDY—HOW CAN WE TELL WHETHER A CLUE IS REAL—OR A FAKE ONE LEFT TO DECEIVE US?
GEE, THAT'S RIGHT...MAYBE WE OUGHT TO WRITE TO MELVIN PURVIS AND ASK HIM WHAT HE DOES!
Melvin Purvis receives the letter, and . . .
HM. FALSE CLUES, EH? THEY OFTEN TRAP THE PERSON WHO LEAVES THEM! I CAN ANSWER THIS LETTER BEST BY TELLING ABOUT AN EXPERIENCE OF MY OWN...AND WHILE I'M DOING IT, HOW ABOUT A BOWL OF POST TOASTIES?
YOU BET, MR. PURVIS!
"I was investigating a bank robbery . . ."
HERE ARE THE GLOVES MULLINS, OUR CASHIER, FORGOT TO TAKE AWAY WITH HIM—WE FOUND THEM RIGHT BY THE VAULT!
I DIDN'T DO IT! SOMEBODY MUST HAVE STOLEN THOSE GLOVES!
HM. MIGHTY CARELESS LEAVING A CLUE LIKE THAT AROUND. LET ME SEE THOSE GLOVES!
WELL, WELL, THIS IS INTERESTING...IS THIS MAN MULLINS LEFT-HANDED?
WHY NO.
THEN—THESE GLOVES WERE PROBABLY LEFT TO THROW US OFF THE TRAIL! THERE'S A FAINT TRACE OF CIGARETTE STAIN ON THE LEFT GLOVE. I HAVE A HUNCH...LEFTY LOUIE THE LEFT-HANDED SAFECRACKER! HE'S REPORTED TO BE IN THIS VICINITY . . .
LATER IN PURVIS' OFFICE
DO YOU ALL KNOW YOUR POSTS? HAS EVERY ONE A COPY OF THIS DIAGRAM? REMEMBER, WE'VE GOT TO MAKE THIS RAID QUIETLY—BUT WITH NO CHANCE FOR ESCAPE!
WE'RE ALL SET, CHIEF!
"My sides took up their positions covering every exit of the building. Two men and I slipped quietly into the building, and . . ."
CAUGHT WITH THE GOODS, EH, LEFTY LOUIE? THE GLOVES YOU PLANTED BY THE VAULT ALMOST HUNG THAT CRIME ON MULLINS—BUT THE STAIN ON THE LEFT GLOVE POINTED AT YOU. A LEFT-HANDED MAN ALWAYS HOLDS HIS CIGARETTE IN HIS LEFT HAND!
MELVIN PURVIS! I SHOULDN'T A' TRIED TO FOOL 'IM!
AND THAT ILLUSTRATES THE GENERAL RULE ALL SECRET OPERATORS KNOW...WHEN A CLUE'S TOO SIMPLE—IT'S USUALLY FALSE! NOW HOW ABOUT SOME MORE POST TOASTIES, PAUL AND JOAN?
I WANT A BIG BOWLFUL, MR. PURVIS!
ME, TOO! THEY'RE THE FINEST THING THERE IS FOR BREAKFAST!

Out-Shipments Show Many Hogs Not Killed at Central Markets

Black portions of circles represent yearly percentages that hogs shipped elsewhere for slaughter from central markets are of total receipts at each of these points.

*Chicago, Kansas City, Omaha, East St. Louis, St. Joseph, Sioux City and South St. Paul.

Source: Statistical Summary, U. S. Dept. of Agriculture.

It is sometimes assumed that when hogs are shipped to central markets they are generally slaughtered at those packing centers. That this is not the case is shown graphically in the chart above. Black portions of circles represent yearly percentages that hogs shipped elsewhere for slaughter from central markets are of total receipts at each of these points.

These out-shipments from central markets represent a substantial part of the total. At East St. Louis, for instance, they approximated 40 per cent in 1915, rising to a peak of 80 per cent in 1930. Even in recent years, the total out-shipments constitute more than 50 per cent at East St. Louis. A similar situation has also prevailed at the seven central markets averaged together, but to a less degree. Here peak years show about a third of the total receipts being shipped out for slaughter, an average of about 25 per cent for the last four years.

Such out-shipments are mainly purchases made by eastern slaughterers, usually not located at a central market, to fill their local demand for fresh pork. This demand on the part of the eastern packer, plus the demand of the mid-western central market packer, plus the demand of the packer at interior points, creates a national market for the hog producer.

High School

The Biology class is studying the human body.

The Economic Geography class is having reports on the various European countries.

Many of the students are getting state board exam booklets for the final tests. It wont be long now.

Someone proposed that the class periods be shortened, but the idea found little favor with fellow-students. Roy, particularly objected, stating that we had too short a time to sleep in the way it was.

Further reports have been given in American History. Glenn gave one on Grover Clevland, Beatrice on Teddy Roosevelt, Opal on William Bryan and Evelyn on Woodrow Wilson.

The new G. R. members were tested on the code and song on Monday. This was necessary before they will be recognized as Girl Reserve, members.

The Freshmen reporter says she has spting fever yet. Guess she wants to be fired from the staff.

What's What

A - another word for miracle when it appears on the report card.
Honor Roll - A place where most of us feel out of place.
Flunking - The common result of an examination.
Library - A meeting place for certain groups at scheduled times to eat, sleep, dream and gossip. Study? Oh, sometimes.
Excuse - Method of developing good imagination.
Exam - A too frequent crisis in a student's life - caused by the instructors.
Cramming - Method used by students desiring to increase their head size before a crisis.
Rule - Obstacle which exists in excessive quantities in the assembly.

Upper Grades

The seventh and eighth grades got their State Board Booklets this week.

Roy H. had the misfortune of swallowing a nickle in school. Next morning he came to school with five pennies in exchange. Not a bad exchange, eh.

Men's Club To Be Formed

At the meeting of the Church council of the Nazareth Lutheran church last Friday evening, the possibility of organizing a Men's Club was discussed. It was decided to call a meeting of all the men who might be interested, on Monday evening, April 26, for the purpose of seeing how many are interested and if enough are interested, to organize at this time. All the men of Holt and surrounding community are invited to come to this meeting. Attendance at this meeting will not obligate anyone to become a member if he does not wish to. It is merely to find out if we want an organization of this kind. Since this is only a mass meeting, no special program is being prepared. Coffee and doughnuts will be served free to those who wish to come.

Those who wish to join but cannot be present at the meeting kindly leave your name with some one who will be there. We hope that many will come, so that we can get the sentiment and take some definite action.

Card of Thanks

I hereby wish to express thanks to the Nazareth Lutheran Ladies' Aid for the flowers given me while I was at the hospital. Also those who visited me and brought flowers, fruit and candy, and for the nice letters.

Farmers Bought Buttermilk

At their regular monthly meeting held on Monday the local creamery board decided to sell the output of buttermilk from the creamery to local farmers instead of the Middle River creamery. The highest bid put in here by fiive farmers was 30 cents per barrel and the Middle River creamery's bid ¼ cents per gallon with the stipulation that if the price on powdered buttermilk went down they in turn expected a reduction in the price they paid for buttermilk.

The local farmers stated that they each had several head of hogs and need the buttermilk at this time.

The creamery at Middle River installed a drier when they built their new creamery last fall and are now shipping powdered buttermilk too other markets for feeding.

Those who bid in the buttermilk here are: J. O. Johnson, Leo Horien, Nils Ness, Rudolph Smith and Henry Fosholm. A few others will get small lots from these bidders for feeding. Mr. Johnson stated that he takes care of 9 barrels of buttermilk per week and is feeding 15 hogs now and will soon have more.

Dale Lee Klungness, infant son of Mr. and Mrs. Peter Klungness received Christian baptisim last Sunday afternoon. Rev. Hanson officiated and his sponsors were Mr. and Mrs. Henry Williams and Mr. and Mrs. Chester Gunderson. He was born February 26.

Last Big Timber Drive In Minnesota

Minnesota, famed in former years for lumber resources, will witness late this month what lumbermen say will be its last big timber drive.

Two hundred rivermen, armed with peaveys, will start this week to send more than fifteen million feet of White and Norway pine logs down the swirling Littlefork river in from the Nett lake Indian reservation in southeastern part of Koochiching and northwestern part of Saint Louis counties. The drive, the first major one in a decade, is expected to last 60 days.

When the logs reach the Rainy river, they will be formed into rafts and towed to the mills at International Falls. Besides the Norway and white pine, about 50,000 cords of spruce and balsam pulpwood are ready to make the river journey.

After this season, says E. J. Carlson of Cass Lake, in charge of timber sales for the Consolidated Chippewa agency, all the timber on Indian lands in Minnesota will be cut on the selective logging plan by which a considerable proportion will be left as seed trees for future growth.

Timber for the International Falls market was cut by 700 men from three camps, while about 10,000 cords have been cut by small operators.

An equal amount has been cut during the winter by another 700 men operating from five camps of the Northwest Paper Co. of Cloquet. Logs from this cutting will be shipped by railroad to Cloquet.

The Chippewa ceded land was opened some yrar ago to homestead entry, with the timber remaining the property of the Indians. Stumpage fees totaling about $90,000 for the winter's cut will be placed in the Chippewa tribal fund.

Much of the winter's cut has been from Indian allotments. The original policy of the Indian service was to market the timber from each Indian's allotted land, cutting clean in the hopes the lands would be developed by the Indian owners for agriculture.

The timber was sold in 1904 and 1920, with the 1920 sales being for cash at stumpage prices that included white pine, $16 a thousand board feet; Norway, $15; spruce, $10; balsam $3.50; cedar poles 25 cents to $4.50 and pulpwood $3.50 a cord.

Individual Indian owners of the land were given the money for the timber, some 80-acre tracts bringing up to $5,000, while timber from the ceded lands sold in 1904 with a payment of 20 per cent down, will bring the tribe about $8.90 a thousand feet, counting interest since sale.

Sales now are being made at $8 for white pine, $7 for Norway, $5 for spruce, $1.75 for balsam and $1 per cord for pulpwood.

Carlson said about 60 million feet of all kinds of timber will be left standing in the Nett lake reservation at the end of this season's cuttings.

When this reaches marketable size the annual cut will be about ten million feet a year in perpetuity, Carlson said. All income from stumpage sales here after will go into the tribal fund.

The Indian service Carlson said, is repurchasing lands held by private individuals in the Minnesota reservations, about 70,000 acres having been acquired during the last year.

The Red lake reservation handles its timber under a different plan, Carlson said, sawing its own logs and shipping the lumber by truck to southern Minnesota, Iowa and many Dakotas points.

SYNOPSIS

Bryn (James Brynildson III), a tall bronzed young man of wealth, and his chum, Tubby Forbes, are discussing Bryn's coming marriage. Tubby believes it a scheme to get Bryn's wealth from him. Should the girl, Deborah, whom Bryn had met at the office of his attorney, Ted Holworthy, marry Stuart Graham before her twenty-first birthday, she will inherit a vast fortune from her grandfather. Stuart had greatly displeased Deborah, who refuses to marry him. Bryn, posing as an unemployed engineer, offers to marry Deborah, as Stuart, for $50,000, they not to live as man and wife. Twenty-three years previous, Anne Larned had eloped with an adventurer on the day set for her wedding to Courtney Graham. Two days after the birth of her daughter, Anne died. Shortly after, the father died. The Larneds, grandparents, took the child with them to Oregon where, without child companions, Deborah grew up. To safeguard her from some fortune hunter, her grandfather had arranged for her to marry Stuart, son of Courtney Graham, when of age, believing the alliance would be a happy one. When Deborah was fifteen, her grandfather died. Securities had been set aside to keep the family, but a market crash left scarcely enough for them to live on. This was unknown to Deborah's grandmother, an invalid, Gary, a servant, managing the finances. At twenty, the thought of marriage greatly frightens Deborah. It had been planned that Deborah meet Stuart in Frisco, where they were to be married. Tubby and Bryn await Deborah in a hotel in Frisco. Over a period of one year the groom is to prove he is no fortune hunter and can make Deborah happy to the satisfaction of her grandmother. Otherwise the fortune is to go to charity. The will is somewhat ambiguous as to whom Deborah is to marry.

"Well," Bryn admitted slowly, "no."

"No? No? But . . ."

"But we told her she could. I told ner. Holworthy told her. Of course, if she's gone off and tried marrying anyone else, he'd have been forced to explain to her that on second reading . . . and so on."

"So," Tubby said with the manner of a talkie villain.

"Well," Bryn said for the third time, "what of it? It gets her out of a jam, doesn't it?"

"And you pay over a million of your own dollars at the end of a year, and she gives you fifty thousand for your services. Is that the way it works, noble Sir Galahad?"

"Oh, I don't know. I think we can break the will. Holworthy's going to do his damnedest. And, if he can't . . . well, the money means quite a bit to her. If—when you meet her you'll understand a little better, Tub."

"Humph," Tubby said.

They both stood up. Bryn looked at his watch. Ten minutes past nine. The grandfather clock choked, muttered, cleared its throat and gasped out that it was nine o'clock.

"Just the same," Tubby said explosively, shaking down his trouser leg, "just the same, a year is too long. An ignorant, unsophisticated, dowdy backwoods country girl, who's never been anywhere or seen anything . . . milk and water, as uninteresting . . . after Pilar! . . ."

"Sh!" Bryn said quickly. He took three steps toward the door at the end of the long room. Tubby stood up, too. The door was opening.

A tall gentleman in black pushed the door open and held it. Behind him came Mr. Holworthy, his smile astonishingly serene and content. For years Mr. Holworthy had guarded Bryn's interests with the stern fidelity of the dragon who guarded the Golden Fleece; yet here he was, calm and undismayed, lending his arm and his moral support to this menace to Bryn's peace of mind, this girl who could wreak the most dire havoc in Bryn's affairs.

Tubby looked at the girl. He choked. Bryn stood without moving.

She was finishing a remark to Mr. Holworthy as she came through the door on his arm. Tubby did not hear the words, but he caught the melody of her voice. It was like that of a very young child, with an appealing break in it; one thought of small birds learning to sing, of hyacinths in spring gardens, of silver bells at twilight.

She was a very small girl as she stood hesitantly there. A very small girl, and she was dressed in white. Her skirt was so full that it stood around her in a circle, and only the tip of one tiny white slipper could be seen below it. She held it off the dusty carpet with the tips of careful fingers. The bodice was slim and pointed, and her waist could have been spanned by a man's two hands. There were little puffed sleeves below her white shoulders; the neck of the dress was low, and above it her throat was creamy white and soft. She had pinned rosebuds against it in front, after a hasty, flushed look into the mirror, and they lay pink and fragrant against her delicate flesh. Around her neck was a short strand of tiny pearls, and from her ears hung little round pearl drops. She looked like a miniature of one's grandmother, painted on her wedding day.

And her face?

A small white oval face, without a hint of color in the cheeks, but with a pair of the softest, reddest lips in the world. They were the kind of lips which look like the bud of a red rose when they say "no" and there was something about the firm little round chin which suggested that she might often say "no." Eyes like purple pansies, soft and velvety and dark; and as if eyes and lips and tiny hands in white lace mittens were not enough, her hair was of red gold, curling and breaking into a million misty tendrils around her face.

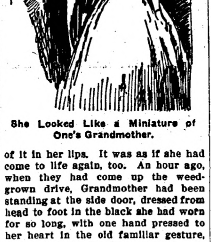
Tubby looked at Bryn. He drew a deep breath. "Noble Sir Galahad," he said under his breath, and moved forward to be presented.

* * * * * * *

Deborah was married and at home again. It was less than a week since she had gone away from the mountain, but it seemed a thousand years. She was so much older, now. She knew so much more than she had known a week ago that her thoughts were like the thoughts of a stranger; she looked at her old life and everything that had been in it with a stranger's eyes, clear, wondering, critical.

They were at luncheon, she and Grandmother and the man, seated at the long table in the middle of the vast shadowy dining room. The ceiling was high and supported by dark heavy oaken beams; at one end was a great fireplace with a carved oak mantelpiece and a stone hearth. The western wall was pierced by a row of six square casement windows shut with ivy. On the table stood the beautiful dulled old silver candelabra which had once been altar pieces in a cathedral; now they held the cheapest and most ordinary thick white candles whose flames wavered and burned coarsely and unevenly, and gave off a strong odor of impure wax.

Deborah sat up and moved the silver spoon beside her plate. She looked across at Grandmother. Grandmother was wearing her gray satin dress for the first time since Grandfather's death. Her white hair was pinned more loosely than usual, and fluffed out softly around her face. Her eyes were sparkling, alight, happy. There was pink in her cheeks, and a thread of it in her lips. It was as if she had come to life again, too. An hour ago, when they had come up the weed-grown drive, Grandmother had been standing at the side door, dressed from head to foot in the black she had worn for so long, with one hand pressed to her heart in the old familiar gesture, and a look of fearful questioning in her eyes. The man had stopped the big battered-looking motor-car, and helped Deborah out. Grandmother had not looked at Deborah at all, except for one quick encompassing glance as if to make sure that she was still intact. Her eyes had gone to the man, and he had stood tall and straight and smiling that faint steady smile of his, waiting. The sun had glinted on his brown hair, and had made his brown skin look very clear and wholesome. Grandmother had looked into his eyes for a long time, a tense, silent, searching look; and then she had drawn a deep breath and put out her hand. She had smiled back at him, a fluttering relieved happy smile, and he had taken both her little white hands in his own. Oh, he was living up to his bargain.



She Looked Like a Miniature of One's Grandmother.

He seemed to understand the situation at a glance and decide what it was he must do. It was perfect acting, and Deborah knew that she should have been grateful and appreciative, but instead she was angry. Angry because . . . well, because, watching him with Grandmother, she had realized suddenly that all the way up from San Francisco he had been acting with her, too, amusing her, making her laugh, telling her interesting things, thinking of her comfort, because it was part of the bargain. On the trip she had forgotten the bargain, the fact that he was going to be paid, and paid well, as he had expressed it, for giving their marriage the appearance of a happy one, the appearance of a real marriage between two young people who had . . . had fallen in love with each other at first sight.

Well, no matter; even if it was a little disconcerting to keep remembering what the true situation was. No harm had been done. She had been reserved through it all, and had not, she assured herself, allowed herself to be anything but impersonal with him. That was the note one must remember to strike: impersonality. Deborah straightened her shoulders and leaned back in her chair, calm, cool, in full control of herself.

Household Questions

New Hot-Water Bottles—Have a little glycerine added to the water with which hot-water bottles are filled for the first time. This will make the rubber supple, and the bottle will last longer.

* * *

For Good Gravy—Did you know that gravy, to be served with roast meat, will taste much nicer and contain more nutriment if it is made with the water in which the vegetables have been boiled?

* * *

Boiling Old Potatoes—Old potatoes sometimes turn black during boiling. To prevent this add a squeeze of lemon juice to the water in which they are boiled.

Shrink the Cord—When loose covers for chairs, etc., are being made, boil the piping cord before using. This little precaution prevents unsightly puckers after the cover is washed.

Preparing Salted Nuts—Here is an ideal manner in which to prepare your salted nuts at home: Take blanched nuts, salt and oil. Sprinkle nuts very lightly with oil, using not more than one teaspoon to one cup of nuts. Spread in one layer in a baking pan and brown delicately in a moderately hot oven — 375 degrees — stirring occasionally that they may color evenly. Sprinkle with salt after removing from the oven, and spread on crumpled unglazed paper to absorb any surface oil.

Different Ups

You can't keep a good man down; nor an impudent one.

Don't Irritate Gas Bloating

If you want to really GET RID OF GAS and terrible bloating, don't expect to do it by just doctoring your stomach with harsh, irritating alkalies and "gas tablets." Most GAS is lodged in the stomach and upper intestine and is due to old poisonous matter in the constipated bowels that are loaded with ill-causing bacteria.

If your constipation is of long standing, enormous quantities of dangerous bacteria accumulate. Then your digestion is upset. GAS often presses heart and lungs, making life miserable.

You can't eat or sleep. Your head aches. Your back aches. Your complexion is sallow and pimply. Your breath is foul. You are a sick, grouchy, wretched, unhappy person. YOUR SYSTEM IS POISONED.

Thousands of sufferers have found in Adlerika the quick, scientific way to rid their systems of harmful bacteria. Adlerika rids you of gas and cleans foul poisons out of BOTH upper and lower bowels. Give your bowels a REAL cleansing with Adlerika. Get rid of GAS. Adlerika does not gripe—is not habit forming. At all Leading Druggists.

HELP KIDNEYS
To Get Rid of Acid and Poisonous Waste

Your kidneys help to keep you well by constantly filtering waste matter from the blood. If your kidneys get functionally disordered and fail to remove excess impurities, there may be poisoning of the whole system and body-wide distress.

Burning, scanty or too frequent urination may be a warning of some kidney or bladder disturbance.

You may suffer nagging backache, persistent headache, attacks of dizziness, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes—feel weak, nervous, all played out.

In such cases it is better to rely on a medicine that has won country-wide acclaim than on something less favorably known. Use Doan's Pills. A multitude of grateful people recommend Doan's. Ask your neighbor!

"Warning in Russian"

By FLOYD GIBBONS
Famous Headline Hunter

FEW bodies of men have ever attracted so much attention as the Canadian "Mounties" and few have ever had so much written about them. The Mounties have been the center of many a tale, both true and of the fictionized variety. This one is true—told by a man who once was a Mountie himself. It's an actual page out of the Canadian Mounted's history, and the man who is telling us about it is Constable Walter D. Fast of Chicago.

Walt served for five years with the Mounties—from 1929 to 1935. And the events which make up this strange tale happened in 1935. Walt was stationed at St. Paul de Metis, in Alberta.

He was out on a routine patrol one July day, riding along a lonely trail, when he saw smoke rising from a clearing up ahead.

He put the spurs to his horse and headed for the clearing. As he came closer, he could see fire and suddenly a hoarse scream came to his ears over the still summer air.

Trapper's Cabin Was Blazing.

At a gallop, Walt pushed toward the blaze. The screams grew fainter as he approached. He dashed into the clearing to find a small trapper's cabin burning furiously.

Even as he approached, the cabin's walls began falling. The screams of the man inside, fading to a low moan, stopped abruptly as beams and timbers dropped on him.

By the time Walt got across the little clearing, the cabin was burned nearly to the ground. There was absolutely no hope for the man within. Walt began seeing to it that the fire didn't spread, and at the same time he began wondering why the man who had died in the ruins didn't get out of that cabin.

There was something strange about it. The cabin was a one story affair, and its occupant had only to step out of the door when it caught fire. If the fire started near the door and blocked his exit in that direction, he could easily have crawled out of a window.

True, the poor devil might have been so ill that he couldn't move, but if so, what was he doing alone in that condition in a lonely cabin in the woods? Walt rejected that theory. Darned few people get so sick they can't move when fire is bearing down on them.

Things Looked Very Suspicious.

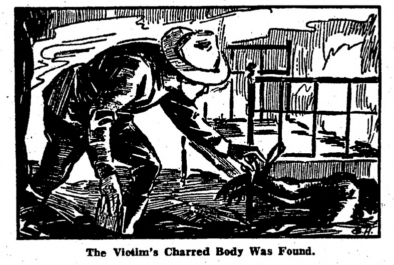
Walt reported the fire and the man's death, and then waited for the embers to cool down. The Mounties went over the ruins of that cabin with a fine-toothed comb. The investigation disclosed some mighty suspicious facts.



The Victim's Charred Body Was Found.

The victim's charred body was found and examined. The poor fellow's hands had been tied behind his back with wire, and bound behind him to an iron bedstead!

There was evidence of foul play all right. But who had done it? The clues found in the cabin didn't help to answer that question. There wasn't a shred of evidence pointing to anyone in the neighborhood.

The Mounties made further investigations. They learned from folks in the vicinity that the dead man had quarreled with one of his neighbors—a Russian—who lived a short distance from his cabin.

Walt went to the Russian's home. The Russian came out in front of the house and Walt started asking him questions. It was just a routine questioning. There wasn't the slightest bit of evidence to link the Russian to the crime, and Walt had no hope of getting any results from his questioning.

The Russian answered questions readily enough. There was no sign of guilt in his face. As the questioning proceeded it seemed to Walt that the fellow had an air-tight alibi.

Sure, he had quarreled with the dead man. The Russian admitted that. But he hadn't been anywhere near the victim's home on the day it burned down, and he had his wife to prove it by.

She Said Something in Russian.

It all looked pretty hopeless, but Walt kept asking questions. And the more he asked the more he became convinced that the Russian was innocent of any connection with the hideous crime. No matter what Walt wanted to know, his suspect had a ready answer.

And then, as Walt was about to give up, the Russian's wife came out of the house and stood listening. Walt asked a couple more questions, and the woman moved closer. Suddenly she began talking to her husband in Russian.

As she began to talk, Walt gave a sudden start. Then he controlled himself and waited. He waited until the woman had finished talking—and then he walked over to the Russian and slipped the handcuffs on him. He knew then what had happened to the poor devil who had been burned alive in that blazing cabin!

Walt took his prisoner to headquarters, locked him up and charged him formally with the crime. Canadian justice moves rapidly, and it was not long before the Russian was brought up for trial.

At his trial Walt testified, and it was chiefly on the testimony he gave that the fellow was convicted, and sentenced to hang. And hang he did, too. Canadian justice is stern as well as swift, and there are mighty few pardons granted.

And what was the testimony which Walt gave and by which the murderer was convicted? The whole secret lay in the Rssian's wife. She had come out of the house while Walt was questioning her husband and had spoken to him in Russian—without knowing that Walt spoke Russian too!

And what she had said was: "Don't tell the policeman you killed him. Say what we agreed to say and they will never be able to prove it on you."

Greyhound Speed

A greyhound can outrun a horse at short distances, and at top speed will hit about 45 miles an hour, Literary Digest says. In top racing condition a dog should weigh approximately 60 pounds and stand from 26 to 28 inches at the shoulder. Whether chasing ostriches in South Africa, deer in South Wales or mechanical rabbits in Florida greyhounds run by sight, not by scent.

Memorial Tablet Below Sea

The only memorial tablet to be placed below the surface of the sea, it is believed, is the inscribed bronze plate that marks the spot, in Kealakekua bay off the island of Hawaii, where Capt. James Cook, the English navigator and explorer, was killed by natives in 1779. Laid in 1928, says Collier's Weekly, the tablet is always covered with water, even at low tide.

Will Import 10 Caribou

They're going to give the Woodland caribou a helping hand up in the wilderness muskeg of Minnesota's Red Lake game refuge where six animals are making the last stand of the species in the United States.

Ten caribou will be imported from Canada, State Biologist Gordon Fredine said Saturday, to bolster the ranks of the straggling band and ward off the fate that befell the American Bison, the trumpeter swan and other extirpated birds and animals.

Fifty years ago the Woodland elk, as they are also known, sported their stately palmated antlers over a wilderness strip that flanked the northern United States from Maine to Minnesota.

Saturday Fredine received a report from Jack Manweiler, game manager with the resettlement administration at Baudette on the international border:

"It appears that it is either a matter of bringing in new blood or letting this valuable animal disappear from the United States."

Perhaps no man is better acquainted with the needs of the caribou than Manweiler who has studied them intentively during the past four years. During that time he saw the herd dwindle from a dozen to the present all-time low.

And so when Manweiler suggested importing ten caribou from Canada, state officials were quickly receptive. Sanction of the biological survey for the move is deemed certain by Biologist Fredine, who hopes to receive the animals in the next few weeks.

Young School Student Called

All the pupils of the local school and the people of this community were saddened on Monday afternoon to hear of the sudden death of Lila Johnson, 16 year old daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. O. Johnson. Lila was a student at the local school and had been out playing during the noonhour and when she came into the school house she dropped dead from what the coroner called heart failure.

Funeral services will be conducted this afternoon at 2 o'clock from the Nazareth Lutheran church with Rev. Hanson officiating.

Lila was also a member of the confirmant class at the Lutheran church and would have been confirmed on May 16 if she had lived.

A complete obituary will be published next week.

Late Snow Storm Hits Here

Starting on Friday with a cold drizzling rain and later turning to snow this community was visited over the week end with one of the latest and severest sleet and snow storms the community has ever known, according to old timers.

The snow which was about a foot on the level, was wet and heavy and gave the ground a lot of needed moisture. Traffic on the state highway was at a standstill Saturday evening on account of snowdrifts and slippery condition.

The Interstate Power company high line running in here was broken down and the village was in the dark from Saturday morning until Tuesday afternoon.

Tha local telephone company had only one line working after the storm are still having a crew repairing broken down lines.

Tuesday and Wednesday the weather warmed up and the snow is now all gone and the farmers are hoping for some dry weather so they can begin springs work. The major rain for this year fell here last week when it drizzled for two days soaking the ground.

Legislature Adjourned Saturday

After having agreed upon many of the major proposals for a tax program the Conference committees of both the House and the Senate at 5 a. m. last Saturday gave up the ghost and declared that it was useless to proceed further. On Saturday both the Senate and the House adjourned sine die and Governor Benson announced that a special session will be called for May 24. This will give the rural members of the Legislature an opportunity to return home and take care of the spring planting and all members of the Legislature a needed rest.

In the merntime the House voted to appoint an interim tax committee in an effort to work out a satisfactory tax program.

For a time it looked as if a complete tax agreement would be reached, although it was generally admitted that the special session would have been necessary to prepare the needed laws as an insufficient time remained to perfect the program, Monday was the last day the governor can sign bills. And it was generally agreed that the tax bill could not be prepared for his signature by that time.

The Legislature broke up with intense bitter feeling on the part of both liberal and conservative groups. The former charged that most of the Senate conferees were corporation lawyers representing the interests of the corporations that are their clients, rather than the interests of the people. They also charged the conservatives with agreeing on a certain program which, on its face, would balance the budget and provide for no increase in the real estate tax levy, upon which the Governor insisted, but that when it came to working out the machinery for carrying out such a program they, in fact, nullified their own agreement.

In calling a special session Governor Benson stated that the tax program acceptable to the Administration and acceptable to the people must provide not a fictitious balancing of the budget but a real balancing of the budget, together with a reduction in the real estate tax levy, because of the unjust heavy tax burden which now rests upon real property.

At the last minute he endeavered to bring both groups together. He issued a statement which also clarified the important tax issues before the Legislature, so that the people, confused by the misrepresentation in the daily press, may understand the situation. The Governor pointed out that the only question before the Legislature is whether a heavier tax burden shall be placed upon "big business, corporations, public utilities, the Steel Trust, and those of great wealth" or whether an added burden shall be saddled on those who own real estate.

"The Administration," the Governor said, "cannot and will not accept a program which will increase the levy on real property. The Senate program would not only make it impossible for the state to balance the budget, but would automatically raise the millage rate on real property sharply, but in this the conservatives are quite content if they can thereby protect their wealthy friends.

4-H Club Sunday In Church

Thousands of Minnesota 4-H boys and girls will be in church Sunday, May 2, to especially observe the day as Rural Life and 4-H Sunday in Church, announces T. A. Erickson, state 4-H club leader, University Farm, St. Paul.

"The 4-H movement has been recognized as one of the great character building elements influncing rural boys and girls" explained Mr. Erickson, "and in order to emphasize these character building values of club work and to stimulate a closer contact between this work and the church, the plan of designating a 4-H Sunday in church was initiated in 1935. Consequently, every fifth Sunday following Easter is known as Rural Life and 4-H Sunday in Church."

Through club work, rural boys and girls are afforded better opportunities for achievement and true service, are developing the social life which helps to make them finer citizens and are learning to work more closely with their parents and are becoming more interested in their homes. These factors, which make for better character development are further enhanced through spiritual development, in which the 4-H Sunday in church is a contributing factor.

4-H members the state over will be carrying out one or more suggestions in observing the day. Some will attend church in groups, some will be contributing flowers to their home churches, or planting some shrub or tree in churchyards, and others, where the churches requests, will be participating in special church services for the day.

At the annual meeting of the Council of Religious Education held in Chicago, Illinois in February, 1937, to which Mr. Erickson was a delegate, the Minnesota 4-H Sunday in church was cited as one of the strong forces of better character education.

★★★By VIRGINIA VALE★★★

EVEN better than having the circus come to town is to find "Elephant Boy" playing at your local motion-picture theater one of these spring days. It is a picture that defies description, for volumes would be necessary to describe the thrilling scenes of vast herds of elephants, the gruesome terror of discontent brewing among the natives of India, the sturdy charm of little Sabu, the twelve-year-old Indian boy who shares stardom with the king of the elephants, the magnificent blending of music with the haunting shrieks of wild animals.

But with all of its other merits, it is the heart-warming friendship of the boy and his elephant that makes one want to go back to see this picture again and again. Robert Flaherty, the explorer-director who hasn't had a picture on our screens since the unforgettable "Man of Aran" made off the coast of Ireland, went to India two years ago and is responsible for "Elephant Boy."

Bette Davis

Back to roles that are hot and low down go Bette Davis and George Bancroft in their new films. When Warner Brothers and Bette Davis ended their long court wrangle, they told her all was forgiven, and certainly they must have meant it, for they have given her the best role of her career in "Marked Woman." George Bancroft comes back in a Columbia picture called "Racketeers in Exile," which is a powerful answer to those reformers who said thay they just wouldn't let us have any more gangster pictures.

For months Sol Lesser has been conducting a search for a Tarzan and at last he found one. Glenn Morris, Olympic champion, will play the role that Johnny Weismuller made famous. Johnny will stay with Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, hoping for more civilized parts.

You never can tell what an actor will be asked to do down at the M-G-M studio. You'd think they'd be satisfied to have Clark Gable and Robert Taylor the romantic idols of half the population, but never satisfied, they are making the lads sing in their new pictures.

Doris Nolan was not too pleased over her role in "The Top of the Town" because it seemed to her that she never had anything to do. She felt that she was all but lost among the fancy sets and big musical numbers, which just shows you that actors are usually wrong about what a picture will do for them. Sam Goldwyn took one look at "Top of the Town" and immediately started negotiations with Universal to borrow Miss Nolan for a prominent part in "Dead End." Meanwhile Miss Nolan had gone off on a motor trip with her sister, to take a look at the cherry blossoms in Washington, to dash over the skyway in Shenandoah valley, and visit relatives in North Carolina. The good news about the big dramatic role, just the sort she has been begging for, reached her en route.

Lily Pons

All the studios are re-making successes of other days, having failed to find new stories that are as good. M-G-M has cast Jean Harlow and Jimmy Stewart in "The Shopworn Angel" which was one of the best pictures ever made when Gary Cooper and Nancy Carroll played it. And Lily Pons will play "Kiki" with operatic flourishes, which was not so good when Mary Pickford played it years ago.

"Executed!"

By FLOYD GIBBONS

FRANK WHITTIE of New York city picked up a book about South American revolutions the other day, and it reminded him of the time he was wandering around Venezuela and ran right smack into one of those tough little two-acre revolutions himself.

It was up in the town of Coro on the north coast, in the year 1929. In the spring of that year Frank found himself out of a job and broke in Lagonillas, and wandered from there to Maracaibo looking for work. There he met up with a stranded Norwegian sailor, and the pair of them started hiking for Caracas.

But they never got to Caracas—and as far as Frank is concerned, he just hasn't any hankering to go there.

It was pretty tough going—that trip overland from Maracaibo. The way was through dense jungle, full of snakes and animals. They drank dirty swamp water—and were glad to get it. The towns were few and far between, and they were half starved on entering every one. They were about all in when they arrived at the outskirts of Coro.

Caught in Middle of a Revolution.

They were looking forward to a decent meal and something better than swamp water to drink. But as they approached the town they heard firing in the distance, and as they came closer they saw that Coro was virtually in a state of siege, surrounded by government soldiers. Another one of those South American revolutions had sprung up overnight, and Coro was no safe place to be in!

What to do? You know those little South American revolutions are sometimes more cruel and bloody—fought with less regard for human life—than the big wars of Europe. If they went on they'd be right in the thick of it. And if they turned back over that long jungle they might starve before they could cover the distance to the nearest town. While they were deliberating, the matter was decided for them. Half a dozen soldiers appeared suddenly on the road ahead and began firing.

Frank pulled the big Norwegian down on the ground. He whipped out a white handkerchief and waved it. The soldiers took them prisoners, marched them into town. They were searched and questioned. In vain did Frank and the Norwegian protest that they were not revolutionists—that they knew nothing about a revolution. They were thrown into a bare, dirty cell, fed some dirty, half-cooked beans, and left there.

Facing the Firing Squad.

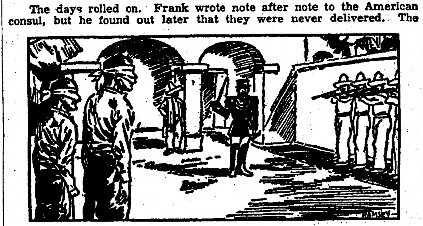
The days rolled on. Frank wrote note after note to the American consul, but he found out later that they were never delivered. The cell faced a courtyard where recruits were being drilled all day long, and Frank, who knew a little Spanish, began talking to them. One recruit in particular took a liking to him, and told him there was an American, Senor King, living in town, who might help him. Frank's heart leaped when he heard that. King was an old boss of his in Lagonillas, and knew him well.



In Another Ten Seconds Both of Them Would Be Dead.

Frank wrote a note to King and sent it out by his friend the recruit. He wrote a half dozen more in the days that followed, but somehow, King never got any of them. And finally, on the ninth day of their incarceration, he heard that they were going to be taken out that morning to face a firing squad.

It was true. Soldiers came and unlocked their cell. Frank and the Norwegian were taken out and blindfolded. They stood with their backs to an adobe wall, and over at the other side of the court they could hear the Venezuelan soldiers loading their rifles. A native officer shouted an order to take aim. In another ten seconds both of them would be dead.

And then, suddenly, Frank's friend the recruit came dashing into the courtyard. Frank heard him crying excitedly that Senor King was outside getting a permit for a revolver, and knew the message was meant for him. If he could only reach King—or get his attention somehow!

Blindfold Dash to Get to King.

Says Frank: "I was blindfolded, but my arms and legs were free. I didn't have a second to lose, so I did the first thing that popped into my mind. I grabbed my friend the Norwegian by the arm and we made a dash for it."

Frank didn't get anywhere in his blindfolded dash. But he didn't get shot either. The native soldiers were so surprised that they held their fire. Straight across the court ran Frank and the Norwegian, bowling over the swarthy little men who tried to stop them, tugging at the cloths that bandaged their eyes and bumping into everything in the way. Frank doesn't know what or who he bumped into. He couldn't see. But he could hear well enough to realize that they were creating a commotion. The uproar could be heard for blocks.

Officers, judges, town officials came running to the court to see what was the matter. And with them came King. About that time Frank had his bandage off. He saw King and yelled to him. King saw Frank and recognized him. "What are you doing here?" he wanted to know. And Frank told him what had happened.

King then turned to one of the city officials. Angrily he told him just what the American consul would do when he heard that an American had been imprisoned without reason and sentenced to death without a trial. Then he turned around and walked off in a rage, vowing that he'd have the United States navy down there if Frank wasn't turned loose by the following day. The Venezuelans hustled Frank and the Norwegian back into their cell on the courtyard.

But early the next morning an armed guard let them out, put them aboard a special train and took them down to the seacoast town of La Vela. There they were put aboard a schooner and told they were free.

Tobacco Cultivated for Ages

Though harassed by many ills and insects, tobacco has been cultivated for centuries. It was used in America when the Spaniards arrived. Long before, however, Cuban aborigines rolled the large leaves cigar fashion and smoked them. These they called tobaccos. Later the term became tobacco. Tobacco seeds are first planted in hotbeds or nurseries. In about six weeks the infant shrubs are moved to fields. An unbranched stem often grows six feet high. Leaves sometimes are two feet long. When the foliage begins to turn the plants are cut, usually near the base.

William Hogarth, Artist

William Hogarth, painter, engraver and pictorial satirist, was born at London in 1697. He served an apprenticeship to a silversmith and about 1720 began business for himself, engraving coats of arms and designing plates for booksellers. In 1724 he entered the art school of Sir James Thornhill. He illustrated Gray's edition of Butler's "Hudibras," and in 1730 began the painting of the satirical pictures that made him famous. Among them are "The Harlot's Progress," "A Midnight Modern Conversation," "The Distressed Poet" and "Marriage a la Mode." He died in 1764.

Indians Who Greeted Columbus Have Now Been Identified

Arawaks From Haiti, Says an Investigator

Washington. — An expedition has unearthed new light on the mysterious Indians who met Columbus, and whom he immortalized in history as "simple, honest and exceedingly liberal" natives.

Returning from the Bahama islands, Herbert W. Krieger of the Smithsonian institution reports first discovery of village sites of this Indian group.

One village where these Indians lived was found at the entrance to a huge cave. Under shelter of the overhanging entrance, Mr. Krieger unearthed a hearth where campfires burned, and pottery used in housekeeping. The cave stretched back for about two city blocks.

A chief's seat is one important object recovered from the cave. The seat, unlike many a stiff throne for European kings, was made with a lean-back effect, and had short legs about four inches high. Scrollwork adorned the wood.

Like Those on Watling Island.

This village discovered by Mr. Krieger is at Hamilton cave on Long island. Long island was one of Columbus' three stopping points in the Bahamas when he made his famous voyage in 1492. Indians of San Salvador or Watling island, where Columbus first landed, were of the same native type and group.

Science has heretofore depended mainly on Columbus' journal for information regarding these long-vanished Indians. Columbus called them the Lucayans.

Mr. Krieger's search for archeological remains has produced cumulative evidence that these Indians were Arawaks who migrated from Haiti. That is, their ancestry linked them with South American Indians rather than with tribes to the north in Florida. They had trade relations, however, with Florida, for their pottery and other objects bear some clues to contact with that region.

They Had Flattened Skulls.

Skulls found by Mr. Krieger show that the Indians met by Columbus had heads flattened front and back. This was a custom among Indians in Haiti, but not in Florida, another fact pointing to southern origin of these Bahaman natives.

Proof that these Indians used tomahawks of stone, with wood handles is announced by Mr. Krieger. Heretofore, only the stone weapon heads have been found, and these were taken for "celts" or unshafted stone axes to be held in the fist. Wood handles have now come to light. The discovery is another that links these Indians with southern origin, for such tomahawks were made in South America.

Modern Negroes of the Bahamas sometimes find the stone heads of these tomahawks, and superstitiously call them "thunderbolts."

Optical Phenomenon Is Discovered in Strange Mineral

Corning, N. Y.—In this modern day, when the properties of ordinary masses of matter are seemingly completely known, it was announced here that in a strange Canadian mineral a new phenomenon of optics had been found.

Scientists of the Optical Society of America heard of the baffling glowing property of a mineral known as Hackmanite. This mineral has been known to science since it was discovered, first in Greenland, back in 1906-08 on a Danish expedition.

O. Ivan Lee, mineralogist of Jersey City, described how Hackmanite exhibits a beautiful red-violet color when first fractured into pieces but how this color quickly passes when the fresh surface is exposed to light.

Mr. Lee's discovery is that this striking and characteristic color may be revived at will if the mineral is exposed to ultra-violet light for a short time. While kept in the dark the color persists permanently but exposure again to ordinary light promptly makes the color fade out.

There are two well-known phenomena which cause materials to glow in a fashion somewhat like Mr. Lee's new discovery. They are fluorescence and phosphorescence. The new-found glowing, however, is neither of these for the color seen is different in shade from the mineral's fluorescent or phosphorescent light.

A Winsome Quartette

THERE was a lull in the mid-morning activities of the Chic Twins (in aprons this time) and their week-end guests when the candid camera caught this gay quartette. The guests are wearing—let's have a close-up — sports dresses because they are so all purpose: tennis frocks go shopping just as often as not. The spectator model to the right with its unusual use of buttons is demure enough to wear when calling on one's Sunday school teacher and yet would have sufficient swing to "belong" in the gallery at the golf tournament. Summer days offer so many unexpected opportunities that these dresses are chosen as equal to any informal occasion.

A Two-in-One Idea.

The aprons on the charming hostesses to the left are both cut from one pattern. The clever miss will never overlook a pattern package that offers two such charming numbers for the price of one. The exhibit is over now; feature in one yourself in the very near future by ordering these patterns today.

The Patterns.

Pattern 1276 is designed in sizes small (34 to 36), medium (38 to 40), large (42 to 44). Medium size requires 1¾ yards of 39-inch material. Pattern 1915 is designed in sizes 14 to 20 (32 to 42). Size 16 requires 3⅛ yards of 35-inch material.

SYNOPSIS

Bryn (James Brynildson III), a tall bronzed young man of wealth, and his chum, Tubby Forbes, are discussing Bryn's coming marriage. Tubby believes it a scheme to get Bryn's wealth from him. Should the girl, Deborah, whom Bryn had met at the office of his attorney, Ted Holworthy, marry Stuart Graham before her twenty-first birthday, she will inherit a vast fortune from her grandfather. Stuart had greatly displeased Deborah, who refuses to marry him. Bryn, posing as an unemployed engineer, offers to marry Deborah, as Stuart, for $50,000, they not to live as man and wife. Twenty-three years previous, Anne Larned had eloped with an adventurer on the day set for her wedding to Courtney Graham. Two days after the birth of her daughter, Anne died. Shortly after, the father died. The Larneds, grandparents, took the child with them to Oregon where, without child companions, Deborah grew up. To safeguard her from some fortune hunter, her grandfather had arranged for her to marry Stuart, son of Courtney Graham, when of age, believing the alliance would be a happy one. When Deborah was fifteen, her grandfather died. Securities had been set aside to keep the family, but a market crash left scarcely enough for them to live on. This was unknown to Deborah's grandmother, an invalid, Gary, a servant, managing the finances. At twenty, the thought of marriage greatly frightens Deborah. It had been planned that Deborah meet Stuart in Frisco, where they were to be married. Tubby and Bryn await Deborah in a hotel in Frisco. Over a period of one year the groom is to prove he is no fortune hunter and can make Deborah happy to the satisfaction of her grandmother. Otherwise the fortune is to go to charity. The will is somewhat ambiguous as to whom Deborah is to marry. The girl arrives with Holworthy. Tubby is surprised to find her charming and sweet. The wedding over, the couple arrives at the home of Deborah's grandmother. The grandmother and Bryn, who she believes to be Stuart, take to one another.

Grandmother was gazing at him again as if she could scarcely take her eyes away. It was unfortunate that he meant so much to her if Grandmother approved of him too highly. It might make it difficult, at the end of the year, to explain why Deborah would be happier without him. And Grandmother in the meantime might think . . . she might expect . . . Deborah moved uneasily.

"My dear boy," Grandmother was saying, "I cannot see that there is the slightest resemblance between you and your father. You are so much taller than he was, so much more . . . perhaps I mean athletic looking. But perhaps I shouldn't have expected you to look like the Grahams. My husband told me years ago, after he had been East to see you, that you looked very much like your mother's people."

"Did he?" the man murmured. "A number of people have mentioned it. I never could see it myself."

"And I cannot see it," Grandmother said decidedly. "Your mother's people were very dark. Why, her two brothers were quite swarthy, and I never thought of her as being in the least fair, or clear-skinned. I never could understand . . ." Grandmother said, and stopped. "But of course," she went on hastily, appalled at what she had almost said, "she was a very fine woman, my dear Stuart."

"I always believed so."

"Of course you did. Although you would scarcely remember her, I think?"

"He doesn't remember her at all," Deborah said quickly. "She died when he was only three, Grandmother. He couldn't possibly remember her."

The man looked across the table. His eyes were twinkling, amused. Deborah looked back at him, coolly.

It wasn't going to be exactly easy to carry off this situation. But no matter how difficult it might be it was better than marrying Stuart Graham. Anything was better than marrying Stuart Graham. Deborah shut her eyes for a moment as she remembered that other face, dark and angry and sneering. There had been very little dissembling on Stuart Graham's part, even in Mr. Holworthy's presence. Apparently it hadn't seemed necessary to him to pretend gentleness and courtesy even for the few necessary hours. It had been perfectly obvious that he hadn't dreamed for a moment that she could or would refuse to marry him, refuse to go through with the horrible bargain. When she did summon up her courage, after two hours of listening to his talk with Mr. Holworthy, when the words sprang to her lips and she heard herself saying in a queer cold little voice that she could never marry him no matter what happened, he had been terrible. He had called her prudish, ignorant, insane.

Grandmother wouldn't have believed it, couldn't have believed it, if she had been told. It would have killed her to bring Stuart Graham here and let her see him as he was. She and Grandfather had told themselves for years that in a miserably unhappy world one star would always shine as bright as the sun; no matter what happened, the Grahams were gentlemen.

Perhaps they were, by birth and tradition, but they didn't always act as gentlemen in books acted. Gary had guessed what might happen. He hadn't been so sure of the Grahams after all. Deborah remembered his words as he had helped her into the rickety wagon down at their neighbor's farm, when he was hurrying her off so that he could go back to Grandmother, alone on the mountain. He had tucked the dust-cover around her and stepped back; and then, suddenly, he had come up close, his old face worn and troubled, and he had said, "If you don't like him, Miss Deborah, don't you have anything to do with him. We'll get along some way. If you don't like his looks, don't you do it. We'll just look around for another way."

This was the other way. The tall young man at the head of the table, willing to sell his gentlemanly appearance, his good manners, his smiles, for a year—for fifty thousand dollars.

Of course, since one must be fair and just, he had not been considering his own opportunities there in Mr. Holworthy's office, not just at first. After Deborah had stood up and told Stuart in that strange voice that she couldn't possibly marry him, after she had repeated it again and again and made him see that she meant it, he had been in a wild rage. It was then that he had said such horrible things to her. His words had come out in such a torrent that Mr. Holworthy couldn't stop them. After a moment Deborah had run away, into an outer office, anywhere to escape from Stuart Graham, of coarse, so loud-voiced, so thick-lipped and bold. But Stuart had followed her. Stuart was a bully. He was still talking to her, pushing himself directly between her and the door between her and freedom, when this quiet young man with the steady gray eyes had risen from a chair and faced him. He stopped his loud talking and began to mutter. But Bryn hadn't moved, except that his arm came straight up, and his fist hit Stuart under the chin with a terrific crash and Stuart had crumpled to the floor.

"Deborah, my darling, what is the matter?" Grandmother said suddenly. "You are quite pale!"

"Nothing, Grandmother," Deborah answered, and managed a smile.

"It's rather a long trip up from San Francisco when you're not accustomed to motoring," the man said. "And it's very hot in the Sacramento valley in June."

"I am sure it must have been trying," Grandmother said, still looking at her tenderly. There was something new and solicitous in her expression. "Now that our greatest problem is solved, surely we can make a real change in our way of living."

"What do you mean?" Deborah asked quickly.

"Oh, so many things, dear." Grandmother leaned forward. "We must furbish ourselves up, for one thing. We are becoming quite careless as to our ways of living. I've been feeling guilty about it for a long time, but I've been so worried about Deborah that nothing else seemed of any particular importance. But now I feel," she finished briskly, "that we must have two or three extra servants at once, have the grounds put in order, have the electric plant repaired . . ."

"But—" Deborah said faintly, and stopped.

"But what, my darling? Would you not like to see the house filled with young company, with music, with life! To have a host of pretty new clothes?"

"We don't know anyone to fill the house with," Deborah protested miserably.

"Stuart does," Grandmother said with confidence. "He told me only a few moments ago that he had a great many friends in San Francisco."

"Grandmother . . ."

She smiled. "Now, Deborah, of course we should not ask anyone for some time, my dear. You and Stuart must have a month or two of your own, first. But during that time the house and grounds can be taken care of; they have been neglected so long it will be quite an undertaking. Since your grandfather wished that we should spend a year here after your mariage, I think we must try and make it a happy year, and in it prepare you as best we can to mingle in society when we emerge at last from our retreat."

"I never want to go away from here," Deborah cried, "never, never!"

"Why, Deborah!" Grandmother said in surprise. "Stuart, the dear child is quite overwrought. Of course you will go away from here, my dear, you and Stuart. The whole world is before you. Am I not right, Stuart? You would not be satisfied to spend all your life here?"

He hesitated, but only for a fraction of a second. Then, "I'm not at all sure that I shouldn't be, if Deborah were to be here," he said.

Deborah jumped from her chair. Her eyes flashed. "Was that necessary?" she asked him bitterly.

Grandmother stood up too, a slight small figure in her gray. "What do you mean?" she asked in a still cold voice.

"Oh!" Deborah began, and stopped. "Nothing," she said slowly. "I am . . overwrought, Grandmother. I think I will go and rest for a little."

"Of course, dear," she answered, relieved. "Of course. I understand. Go along, then . . . and your things are in the silver rooms in the south wing."

"The silver rooms?" Deborah repeated. Involuntarily her startled eyes fell to the man's and gray and violet clung together. Deborah's cheeks began to burn. She looked away.

Internal Parasites Cut Hog Profits

—Prepared by American Foundation for Animal Health

Few farmers realize the terrific damage done to their hogs—and to their hog profits—by the worms and internal parasites which infest practically all hogs in one form or another. The dollars and cents loss easily runs to several millions of dollars annually.

The most common of these parasites are the large roundworm, familiar to every farmer, the thornhead worm, nodular worm, and lung worm. The roundworm does the greatest damage of all. Eggs of this worm are picked up from the hog lot, hatch out in the pig's intestine, penetrate the bowel and enter the blood vessels, whence they travel to the liver. From there they pass to the heart and lungs. Then they go through the air passages and back into the stomach and intestines to complete the circuit.

By the time hundreds of worms have passed through the organs of a hog in this manner, they have done untold damage. The liver suffers, first, then the lungs, and many baby pigs die of pneumonia caused by such worms.

Thornhead worms attach themselves to the wall of the intestine. Kidney worms damage both liver and kidneys. Nodular worms lower the resistance of young pigs, and lead to ulcers and abcesses.

One of the worst results of worm infestation is the lowering of the hog's resistance to disease. Once his system becomes run-down, the hog is an easy prey to any disease or epidemic that comes along—and he hasn't the vitality to fight back. Such epidemics as hog cholera find wormy hogs easy victims, unless they have been previously immunized by vaccination. It is likewise true that vaccinating hogs which are badly infested with worms, may also be a dangerous business. This is another reason why vaccinating should never be done by anyone but a veterinarian, who can tell whether hogs are in condition to receive the serum and virus without danger.

The impression should not be given, however, that worms particularly lead to cholera. They simply weaken the condition of the hog. And when a hog is run down, whether from worms or one of the many other causes, he is an easy prey to this ever-present menace. That is why it is always good practice to have hogs immunized against cholera; for after they have contracted the disease, it is too late.

Any automobile driver who will take his car out knowing that the brakes are not in the best of condition, ought not to be priviledged to drive an automobile.

The ability to stop when it is absolutely necessary is very important. Can you stop? It is too late after the accident. It is, therefore, very necessary that this part of your automobile be given regular and periodic inspections.

It is better to spend money for checking up brakes and having them adjusted than to have years of regret because of an automobile accident that you know full well could have been avoided had your brakes been in proper working condition.

After the accident has happened, many people know what should have been done or could have been done to have eliminated that accident, but how many think of these things while they are driving before the accident? Think!

HOLT WEEKLY NEWS

Issued Weekly From The Home Of The Biggest Co-operative Creamery In Marshall County

Verner Nelson, Publisher; Mrs. Mabel Hanson, Editor & Bus. Mgr. Holt, Marshall County, Minnesota, Friday, May 7, 1937. Volume 26, Number 1

It's Our Birthday

The News is this week celebrating another birthday. We have just passed another milestone in the field of public service.

You often hear that the first hundred years are the hardest. If so, we are lucky as we are over the quarter century mark and on the second year of the first half of the 100.

We extend our thanks to the people of Holt and community for their loyal support in the past and hope that we have conducted ourselver toward you so that we may merit your continued support in the future.

The present owner of the News has been at the helm of it during the past 12 years and the past two years have not been so rosy due to serious illness.

The Publisher.

IN MEMORIAM

In loving memory of our dear father Gilbert O. Johnson who passed away six years ago, on May 9th.

No, not cold beneath the grasses
Not close-walled within the tomb
Rather in our father's mansion
Living in another room.
Shall we doubt our fathers mercy?
Shall we think of death as doom?
Or the stepping o'er the threshold
To a bigger brighter room.
Daddy went to that great mansion
Six years ago to date.
God alone knows how we miss him
Soon we'll meet him at the pearly gate.

Sadly missed by his children, Clifford, Olaf, Alma and Gilma Johnson, Mrs. Elmer Nohre and Mrs. Melvin Swanson.

Governor Benson Opposes Higher Tax on Real Estate

Governor Benson made it very clear last week that so long as he occupies the chair of chief executive in the state of Minnesota he is unalterably opposed to increasing taxes on real estate as a means of meeting the state's obligations.

In clarifying the position of the Administration and the liberals in both Senate and House in regard to the tax situation which resulted in both Senate and House in regard to the tax situation which resulted in an impasse last week and the failure of the Legislature to enact a tax program, the Governor stated that he considered it necessary that "the state meet the problem of current expenditures with current revenues so that we do not place a heavy debt burden on future generations; that real estate, particularly those who own homes and farms, is now bearing a too great tax burden, and that it is imperative that the millage rate on property not only should not be increased but materially reduced."

Scoring the deliberately confusing stories circulated regarding the tax situation which required the calling of a special session set for May 24, Governor Benson reiterated that Senate conservatives were responsible for the special session because of their their patent unwillingness to compel the public utilities, big business, and those of large personal incomes to pay their just share of governmental costs caused by relief and social security obligations to the state's more unfortunate citizens

He also pointed to serious shortcomings in the original Senate ominibus bill which failed to provide taxes on mining companies and would have increased the real estate tax levy by approximately 10 mills.

School Notes

Editor-in-Chief: Beatrice Larson

Ho hum! Only six weeks left of school. Some call it six weeks of torture, others six weeks of fun. So what? The greatest blow for the parents at least, comes around on Wednesday when report cards will again arrive to display their brilliant colors.

The American History class took a six-weeks test on Tuesday covering the period from the Spanish American War through the World War times.

The Modern History students themselves are beginning to wonder if they do study their lessons. The other day Mr. Nybakken asked what their text books said about a certain question. Lo and behold! Alfred was the only one who knew that it wasn't mentioned in the book.

The English 2 class is studying Tennysons "Idylls of the King", but the Sophs are idle when the time comes to study.

Why didn't Ferne express her opinion on the question discussed in regard to Alfred's play? Wonder if the fact that the night before was Wednesday night had anything to do with it. How about it, Ferne?

The English 3 class learned "To A Waterfowl", a poem by William Cullen Bryant and were requested to write it on Wednesday.

I guess some of our freshies are rather verdant. What's the matter Don? Can't you remember October? Just think of Hallowe'en and you'll be O K.

The General Science class tested milk but no one dared to taste it.

The class play cast is practising in grand style. Watch for announcements.

The entire faculty and student body of Holt school extend their deepest sympathy to Mr. and Mr. J. O. Johnson and family in their recent bereavement in the loss of their daughter and sister Lyla Idella.

It has often been said, and in this column, too, that accidents do not happen.

The cause of any particular accident may be attributed to a careless driver, to a pedestrian, to a defect in the highway, to a mechanical defect, to hazardous weather conditions, or to a combination of a number of these factors.

Yearly statistics, as prepared by all states and Bureaus, indicate that the human element is the outstanding cause. The driver of the automobile is usually the cause of all the trouble.

When the actions of drivers have been carefully checked according to the statistics given in recent years, it is found that two out of every three accidents involves mistakes by drivers. Excessive speed caused 7,240 deaths in 1935. Driving on the wrong side of the road caused another 3,940 deaths, and so on.

We are to blame - not the machine.

SYNOPSIS

Bryn (James Brynildson III), a tall bronzed young man of wealth, and his chum, Tubby Forbes, are discussing Bryn's coming marriage. Tubby believes it a scheme to get Bryn's wealth from him. Should the girl, Deborah, whom Bryn had met at the office of his attorney, Ted Holworthy, marry Stuart Graham before her twenty-first birthday, she will inherit a vast fortune from her grandfather. Stuart had greatly displeased Deborah, who refuses to marry him. Bryn, posing as an unemployed engineer, offers to marry Deborah, as Stuart, for $50,000, they not to live as man and wife. Twenty-three years previous, Anne Larned had eloped with an adventurer on the day set for her wedding to Courtney Graham. Two days after the birth of her daughter, Anne died. Shortly after, the father died. The Larneds, grandparents, took the child with them to Oregon where, without child companions, Deborah grew up. To safeguard her from some fortune hunter, her grandfather had arranged for her to marry Stuart, son of Courtney Graham, when of age, believing the alliance would be a happy one. When Deborah was fifteen, her grandfather died. Securities had been set aside to keep the family, but a market crash left scarcely enough for them to live on. This was unknown to Deborah's grandmother, an invalid, Gary, a servant, managing the finances. At twenty, the thought of marriage greatly frightens Deborah. It had been planned that Deborah meet Stuart in Frisco, where they were to be married. Tubby and Bryn await Deborah in a hotel in Frisco. Over a period of one year the groom is to prove he is no fortune hunter and can make Deborah happy to the satisfaction of her grandmother. Otherwise the fortune is to go to charity. The will is somewhat ambiguous as to whom Deborah is to marry. The girl arrives with Holworthy. Tubby is surprised to find her charming and sweet. The wedding over, the couple arrives at the home of Deborah's grandmother. The grandmother and Bryn, who she believes to be Stuart, take to one another, which somewhat displeases Deborah, who foresees difficulty when they are to separate after a year.

"No objections, my dear. The silver rooms were always intended for you, but you preferred to be near me rather than in the south wing alone. Go along, my darling, and perhaps after a little I will follow your example. The excitement and the happiness have quite tired me out."

Deborah went across the room and through the door. She wanted to stamp and kick and scream. This must be how a rabbit felt when it was caught in a snare. She went on, up the long curving staircase, down the corridor into the south wing, through the second door on the right. Inside was a sitting room, with walls panelled in silver, with rugs and chairs and curtains done in deep violet. There was a huge four-poster bed against the inner wall, with a beautiful violet- and tarnished-silver spread upon it, and a low silver bowl of violets on a little table at one side. And, at the foot of the bed, was a man's heavy pigskin bag, as yet unopened.

She went across to it and lifted it with a vicious jerk. It was heavy. She went through the bedroom and the sitting room to the corridor. She put the bag down with a thump on the floor outside the door, pulled the sitting room door shut with a bang and shot the bolt.

CHAPTER III

There were high spiked iron gates at the end of the weed-grown drive. Bryn leaned his shoulders against them, took his silver case out thoughtfully and lit a cigarette.

There is a moment in every day among the mountains when afternoon is definitely over and evening has come. Her dusky silent presence is as real as the moon and stars will be when night falls later on. It is made known to the watcher by a change in the quality of the sunlight, as if a silvery veil had fallen suddenly across the sky.

Bryn recalled that in the last ten miles of narrow, almost impassable road, they had passed but one other dwelling, a small tumble-down shack on a patch of rocky, unkempt mountainside; there, presumably, belonged the boy and the dog he could hear in the distance; the only neighbors.

He turned and walked slowly up the dark path toward the house.

The birds outside Bryn's window wakened him very early; the morning air was still night-cold and fresh when he yawned, stretched, put his hands behind his head and listened for a moment or two to the long involved scoldings and chatterings of a bird family. Bryn threw back his quilts and sprang out of bed.

A few minutes later, in his white shirt and gray knickerbockers he closed his door noiselessly and tiptoed down the hall past the door which must be Deborah's, since it was the only closed one along the corridor. Gary, who was obviously in Deborah's confidence, had been most reluctant even to give Bryn a room in this wing, but it couldn't be helped, since Mrs. Larned herself was in the north wing.

Bryn stepped out over the puff of dew-laden grass at the foot of the steps, to the wide red uneven stones of the path. He thrust his hands in his pockets and sauntered along the side of the south wing and around the end. He was facing the mountain now; there was still a little broken wreath of mist around the top. Between him and the forest, at the back of the stretch of park land, he could see the serrated rows of the orchard trees, and a clear flat space beside it which appeared to be a garden. He followed the narrow beaten path, hedged with drooping wet grass, across to the corner of the orchard. He came to a stop beneath a cherry tree whose topmost boughs were still laden down with heavy fruit. Bryn regarded it. He put a foot on a low branch and swung himself up into the tree as far as the heavier branches would take him.

The cherry tree, being on the side of the hill, was a vantage point. Below him the house, smothered in its ivy, lay without a sign of habitation. Beyond it the brook was marked out by the double line of weeping willows which had been planted on its banks, but no glint of water came through the green to prove its existence.

Directly ahead lay a gentle slope of meadow; and as Bryn's eyes fell upon it he caught quite distinctly a flash of blue across the green.

He blinked, started at it, stretched himself incautiously to make sure of what he saw. It had most certainly been a gown. He climbed down hastily from the tree and started off across the garden.

He came at last into the natural clearing which had once been the bottom of the stream; it was dotted over with clumps of small bushes, covered with a carpet of green velvet. He stopped and surveyed it for a moment before his eyes caught again that blue flash . . . ah, there she was.

Deborah was kneeling on the side of a little knoll, with a round blue bowl beside her. For a moment she did not see him approaching, so intent was she on her task. She was picking wild strawberries, leaning forward to separate them from their stems, dropping them one by one into the bowl. She was dressed in a short-sleeved blue dress, perhaps a little faded, but still extremely becoming.

She looked up, startled, her eyes wide and dark.

"Good-morning," Bryn offered cheerfully. "Did something happen to your clock, or do you usually get up at half-past five?"

She dropped a berry into the bowl. She lifted her stained little finger-tips and looked at them. "I usually get up," she replied.

Bryn dropped down comfortably on the grass a yard away.

She gathered her skirts together around her knees, rose, and moved farther away. "I don't think there are any berries left where you are," she remarked. "But you ought to look before you get down on the ground."

"I did look," Bryn replied. "You may not have seen me, Deborah, but I looked. My eye is very quick. I pride myself on it. To see one of nature's jewels shining among the dank and ugly grasses is one of the things I'm best at."

Across the knoll she regarded him steadily. "It sounds very poetic," she said at last.

"Deborah," Bryn began.

The color flashed back into her cheeks. "Must you call me that?" she demanded. "I didn't ask you to call me that. You haven't any right."

"I was about to discuss that very question myself," Bryn replied "I was about to ask you if we couldn't come to some sort of compromise."

"Compromise?"

"We got on very well on the trip up here. You didn't seem to mistrust me. But after we got here—yesterday at lunch, and last night at dinner, and in the drawing room later—you must admit it was difficult."

She lifted her chin. "You were so—familiar," she said proudly.

"Familiar?" he repeated.

"I don't think it was necessary. You . . . you talked as if . . . you looked at me . . . you . . . and you put your arm around Grandmother when you said good-night. I saw you."

"I couldn't help it," Bryn said mournfully. "She's a very nice grandmother, after all, isn't she? And I never saw one like her before. If you can imagine it, Deborah, I never had a grandmother of my own."

"I didn't like it. I won't have it. It's bad enough to . . . to deceive her at all, but I have to do that for her own good. I have to do what I've done. If I'd come back not married . . . and told her about . . . him, then we'd have had to tell her everything. How poor we are, and how desperate. And she would worry so much about me it would kill her. There wouldn't be anything ahead. This way, there's at least the money, and by the end of the year . . . but I won't take advantage of her. I can't bear to have you making so much of her when you don't mean it, when you're not honest."

"Don't you believe in love at first sight, Deborah?"

She sprang up and faced him. "That's what Gary said you'd start talking about next," she accused. "I think you might have better taste, if nothing else!"

"I suppose he compared me to a leech. I suppose he couldn't understand that a young man could enter into a business agreement with a young lady on perfectly clear and straightforward grounds, emotion having no part thereof?"

She raised her eyes. "Just a minute ago you started talking about . . . love at first sight!"

"My child, I was speaking of your grandmother. I intended to explain that my feeling for her was, in spite of your assumption to the contrary, honest. I was about to mention her gentleness, and her delicacy, and a few other qualities which would win the heart of a stone image, and to explain to you that any feeling of tenderness which I displayed toward her was quite sincere."

Talk About Smart Frocks

"AUNT ALMA, there's just one thing I don't like about my new dress—it's so attractive I'm afraid Sis over there will appropriate it when I'm not looking. Outside of that I'm crazy about it, and I think you're swell to make it for me. Why—"

"What's this, what's this? If that isn't a laugh. Aunt Alma! Imagine me wanting anybody's dress. Why since you've taught me to sew-my-own I never want anything. I just make it and that's that. This sport dress, for instance, took me only one afternoon."

"I think you do wonderfully well with your sewing, my dear. You'll be making my clothes the first thing I know. I feel especially pleased with my new spring dress and I have both of you to thank for suggesting this style. It does right well by my hips, and it's so comfortable through the shoulders. I guess I should diet but in this dress I feel nice and slender. Don't you see, girls, how important it is to choose a style that's particularly becoming. It's abiding by this theory that gives some women such enviable chic."

Gas, Gas All the Time, Can't Eat or Sleep

"The gas on my stomach was so bad I could not eat or sleep. Even my heart seemed to hurt. A friend suggested Adlerika. The first dose I took brought me relief. Now I eat as I wish, sleep fine and never felt better." —Mrs. Jas. Filler.

Adlerika acts on BOTH upper and lower bowels while ordinary laxatives act on the lower bowel only. Adlerika gives your system a thorough cleansing, bringing out old, poisonous matter that you would not believe was in your system and that has been causing gas pains, sour stomach, nervousness and headaches for months.

Dr. H. L. Shoub, New York, reports: "In addition to intestinal cleansing, Adlerika greatly reduces bacteria and colon bacilli."

Give your bowels a REAL cleansing with Adlerika and see how good you feel. Just one spoonful relieves GAS and constipation. At all Leading Druggists.

Watch Your Kidneys!

Help Them Cleanse the Blood of Harmful Body Waste

Your kidneys are constantly filtering waste matter from the blood stream. But kidneys sometimes lag in their work—do not act as Nature intended—fail to remove impurities that, if retained, may poison the system and upset the whole body machinery.

Symptoms may be nagging backache, persistent headache, attacks of dizziness, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes—a feeling of nervous anxiety and loss of pep and strength.

Other signs of kidney or bladder disorder may be burning, scanty or too frequent urination.

"Jungle Nightmare"

By FLOYD GIBBONS
Famous Headline Hunter

WELL, sir, here's a real, dyed-in-the-wool adventurer for your money. Jack A. Matthews of New London, Conn., says he ran away from home in 1895, and one year later, on his sixteenth birthday, he was shooting Indians in the Sierra Perija mountains of Venezuela and Colombia.

And that was just the beginning of a life of adventure in the South American jungles, prospecting for gold, and hunting for rubber, which, in those days, Jack says, was worth a dollar a pound and as good as cash. The jungles were full of rubber then. All you had to do was go and get it.

But the jungles were full of head-hunting Indians, too—and animals, and snakes, and fever and a whole lot of other things. The man who went hunting rubber earned every cent of the dollar a pound he got for it. And it's the story of something that happened on a rubber hunt that Jack is going to tell us about today.

On the Trail of the Rubber Hunters.

Jack takes a sock at explorers of today who come back from the jungles claiming to be the first white man to set foot in a certain region. "Why," he says, "we cut the trails for those fellows." And I can believe it, too, for Jack speaks of places I've never heard of and of rivers I can't even find on the map when he tells of the route he and his party of adventurers took to get to the rubber country. They paddled through a seven-mile canyon where Jack says the water roared with a sound like ten subways and ran so swiftly through the narrow gap that it crowned itself higher in the center than on the sides.

"We got through with our canoes," he says, "by following the eddies and back currents along the canyon walls. The sharp projecting corners were tough, as the water hit them with such a force as to turn over like land being plowed. The navigation was dangerous—but we made it."

And then, on they went, down through the territory of the Jivaro Indians, who cut the heads off their victims and shrink them down to the size of oranges. They passed through the Jivaro territory, and, at length, found rubber trees and settled down to the job of collecting rubber.

Ran Across a Beautiful Jaguar.

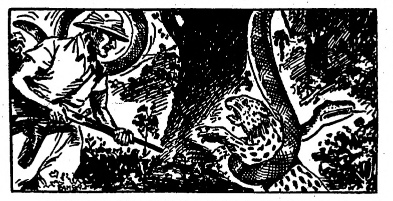
"My job," says Jack, "was to find the trees and blaze them, and sometimes I would trail the roots of a rubber tree for hundreds of yards through dense jungle. On all these trips I carried a machete in a scabbard, a holstered .38 six gun and a ten-gauge shotgun slung across my shoulder. I was usually alone on those trips and I had to be able to fight my way back to camp if I were attacked by Indians."



The Snake Wrapped Himself Around the Jaguar.

One day on such a trip Jack was cutting a trail to one of the biggest rubber trees he had ever seen. Half way to the tree he got tired and sat down to eat a lunch he had brought with him. He had just finished when he heard leaves stirring down the trail, and, mindful of the ever present danger of Indians, he grabbed up his shotgun and slipped into the growth behind him. He had no sooner reached cover than he heard a sound that explained the stirring of those leaves. The cough of a jaguar.

"It was so close that it startled me," Jack says. "The jaguar walked slowly down my newly cut trail, stopped where I had eaten and sniffed at a sausage skin I had thrown there. He was such a beautiful animal that I didn't want to shoot. I eyed him through the grass, and he must have felt my eyes boring into him, for suddenly he faced me with a growl. He had discovered me."

Still Jack didn't shoot. "I think I forgot to," he says. "We stood gazing at each other for a moment, not three feet apart. And then, suddenly, a long snake fell from the tree tops, and, with a lightning-like motion, wrapped itself around the beautiful animal.

Battling With a Huge Snake.

"In an instant the silence was broken by a crashing bedlam. The jaguar leaped—almost got free. It bit and clawed and screamed. But the scream was a hopeless one, for the snake had the jaguar tight in its grasp now and was squeezing it to death. The jaguar fought furiously, striking and biting—but the loops were tightening on him. He had one paw on the ground and he caught a root—began dragging the snake to one side. The snake lashed out with its tail for something to get a hold on, and—"

And that's where Jack, standing a scant three feet away from the struggle, began to take an active part in it. The snake's lashing tail reached into the undergrowth and caught hold of Jack.

"It touched me," he says, "and immediately wrapped itself around me. Then I pulled the trigger of the gun in my hand. I heard the impact of the buckshot, but I had shot the jaguar. And the snake's powerful tail was dragging me right out of the grass. I was knocked off my feet and the gun was scraped out of my hand. Immediately the snake let go of the dead jaguar and went to work on me.

"I reached for my machete and got it out just as the snake got a loop around my waist. I could feel the breath going out of my body as I swung the machete. If that blow missed I might not get a chance to swing another. But the blade hit the snake squarely across the body and almost cut it in two. Another swing finished the job. The loops relaxed and I was free.

"The tail end of the snake quivered and the head slashed about in all directions, but after the squeezing I had taken I didn't have strength enough to move. I lay with my head on the jaguar when the men came from camp. They had heard my single shot and had come from the river expecting to find me with an Indian arrow through me. They carried me back to the landing, where I soon got over the squeezing. The natives skinned the jaguar. It was nine feet from tip to tip, while the snake, when measured, was thirty-eight feet long."

Odd Marriage Rites Are Observed by Canadians

Ancient matrimonial customs prevailing in certain sections of some French Canadian provinces probably would amaze prospective brides in the United States. Much of the form and tradition harks back two and three centuries to the mother country, France, says a writer in the Philadelphia Inquirer.

In some outlying districts and villages a wedding assumes the character of a festival.

One of the picturesque customs surviving among the "habitants," or rural residents, is that of the public wedding procession which passes through the streets to the church.

At the head of the procession is the groom, his two nearest of kin walking with him. Next come his friends and relatives who are married, marching in pairs, and then the single men of his entourage. Behind them comes the bride, escorted by a large assemblage of her own relatives and friends marching in the same order as those of the groom.

Another quaint custom is the wedding feast. The bride is seated at the head of the table, but the groom stands behind the chair and serves her throughout the dinner.

Items of Interest to the Housewife

Dust-Proofing Pictures—Has the dust got into your picture frame? It should be examined periodically and new brown paper backings should be stuck on to make it dust-proof.

• • •

Oiling Household Machinery—A little oil applied when needed will keep household machinery working longer and always ready for work. You can use cooking or salad oil to lubricate small cooking equipment.

• • •

Colorful Apples — If apples are put in water containing a little lemon juice a few minutes before cooking, they will keep their color.

• • •

Date Pie—Two cups milk, half pound dates, two eggs, one-quarter teaspoon salt, nutmeg. Cook dates with milk twenty minutes in top of double boiler. Strain and rub through sieve, then add eggs and salt. Line pie plate with paste, pour in filling and bake in quick oven at first to set rim, decrease heat afterwards.

• • •

Stuffed Celery—Prepare inner stalks of celery. Fill them with equal parts of creamed Rocquefort and cream cheese, mashed till smooth with paprika, and serve side by side on a boat-shaped dish, or diced, in place of celery and cheese. Or if preferred use creamed cream cheese for the filling after flavoring it to taste with pepper, salt, paprika, chopped chives or shallots and pimiento. A touch of tomato catsup can also be added.

• • •

Bechamel Sauce—Melt a quarter cup butter in saucepan, add one-quarter cup flour, stir until smooth. Add gradually one and a half cups of highly seasoned chicken stock while stirring constantly. Add one-half cup of hot cream and beat until smooth and glossy. Season with salt, pepper and fine grating of nutmeg. If a yellow sauce is desired, remove sauce from range and add the beaten yolks of two eggs diluted with one-quarter cup warm cream. Do not allow sauce to boil after adding egg yolks.

• • •

Angel Cake — One cupful of white of eggs, one and one-quarter cupfuls of granulated sugar. One cupful of flour. One-half teaspoon cream of tartar. A pinch of salt added to whites before whipping; flavor to taste. Cook in a very slow oven. Yolks of the eggs may be used for mayonnaise.

• • •

Garbage as a Compost—Garbage and vegetable matter of all sorts buried underground will in time rot into excellent compost for use on lawn, garden or field.

• • •

When Washing Paint—Add a little turpentine to the hot soapy water. It greatly simplifies the job and makes much less "elbow grease" necessary, especially when the paint has that rather greasy film caused by the fumes from fires or gas stoves.

What I must do is all that concerns me, not what the people think. . . It is easy in the world to live after the world's opinion; it is easy in solitude to live after our own; but the great man is he who in the midst of the crowd keeps with perfect sweetness the independence of solitude.

FIRESTONE TIRES AND AUTO SUPPLIES SAVE MONEY IN EVERY FARM OPERATION

EVEN though the prices of farm crops are advancing, the best way you can make more money is to SAVE IT in production costs.

YOU SAVE 25% in fuel costs and 25% in time by putting Ground Grip Tires on your tractor and all wheeled farm implements. They ride and pull easier and reduce repair bills.

YOU SAVE because one set of Firestone Tires will fit several implements. Your Implement Dealer or Firestone Tire Dealer has a plan whereby he will cut down the wheels on your present implements to a uniform diameter and weld a flat, steel rim to the end of the spokes. And by the use of Firestone Demountable Rims the tires and rims can be taken off one machine when not in use and applied to another.

YOU SAVE because Firestone Ground Grip Tires are built with EXTRA construction features. These outstanding advantages are patented and used only in Firestone Tires. Gum-Dipping saturates and coats every cord with pure liquid rubber. This process counteracts internal friction and heat and makes the tire much stronger to resist the strains of the extra pull. The two extra layers of Gum-Dipped cords under the tread bind the tread and body together into one inseparable unit of tremendous strength. The scientific arrangement in spacing of the deep, rugged bars of the self-cleaning tread gives greater traction and drawbar pull.

YOU SAVE by buying NOW as tire prices are sure to advance. The price of crude rubber has advanced 110% and cotton more than 26% during the past two years. Tire prices are bound to go higher. Buy Firestone Ground Grip Tires NOW for your cars, trucks, tractors and all wheeled farm implements and make money by reducing your cost of production. See your Implement Dealer, Firestone Tire Dealer or Firestone Auto Supply and Service Store TODAY.

The Farmer's Choice FOR RURAL HIGHWAYS

IT REALLY doesn't pay to drive on tires after the "non-skid" is worn off — in fact, the last 1,000 miles of wear in a tire are only worth about 38c. Why take the risk of a dangerous skid or perhaps fatal blowout when new Firestone Standard Tires cost so little?

More and more farmers are buying Firestone Standard Tires because they get the benefits of Gum-Dipping, the Firestone patented process that counteracts internal friction and heat which ordinarily destroy tire life. They get longer, non-skid mileage and unusually low cost per mile with dependable SAFETY.

It is almost unbelievable that so much tire could be bought for so little. Firestone developed this tire primarily for rural highway use and a tire of first grade quality could only be made to sell at these low prices by building them in tremendous quantities. That's why you SAVE in first cost and in cost per mile. You also SAVE yourself from accidents because they give greater protection against dangerous skidding and blowouts.

Farmers everywhere are making Firestone Dealers and Firestone Auto Supply and Service Stores their headquarters for all automotive supplies. You get greater values in everything you buy and you get all your needs in one place—including tires — tubes — batteries — spark plugs — brake lining — fan belts — car radios — home radios — garden hose and garden tools — seat covers —light bulbs, and more than 2,000 other useful articles. You can be sure when you buy Firestone products you are getting the greatest value for your money. If you have not received the new 1937 Firestone Auto Supply Catalog, write for it today — address Firestone, Akron, Ohio, or Los Angeles, California.

Motony produces fatigue. Statistics show that some of our most serious accidents - in fact, the largest percentage off them - are caused by drivers smashing up on straight roads.

Possibly the solution is to have winding roads, well marked, so that attention of the driver will be on his driving at all times. While many accidents do occur on hills and curves, a great many others occur on wide, straight, smooth highways.

It's all very well to inorease your alertness when the road is full of twists, turns, and hills. Never let yourself take it too easy at any time while driving an automobile.

U. S. AGENCY PROPOSED TO HELP COOPERATIVES

A presidential commission which studied co-operatives offering Europeans everything from food to funerals has recommended establishment of a government agency to give information and advice to such American organizations.

Some members of the commission warned, however, that "high pressure" promotion of the movement would lead to graft and failure.

The six members differed widely on the possibility of adapting the idea to the United States.

They agreed, however, consumer groups should be given the same credit facilities as farmers' cooperatives and private business and recommended a government survey of consumer and service cooperatives in this country.

On the possibilities in this country, Jacob Baker, former Works Progress official, and Leland Olds, New York state power executive, were most optimistic.

PROPOSE PASSAGE OF JUNIOR COLLEGE BILL

A delegation of 75 persons from northwestern Minnesota appeared before the house appropriations committee at the state capitol recently, on behalf of the proposed two-year junior college at Crookston, but no action was taken on the bill. An appropriation of $50,000 is sought for teachers salaries and expenses in remodeling. Mayor W. J. Kirkwood of Crookston was the chairman of the huge delegation.

Don't Neglect Them!

Nature designed the kidneys to do a marvelous job. Their task is to keep the flowing blood stream free of an excess of toxic impurities. The act of living—life itself—is constantly producing waste matter the kidneys must remove from the blood if good health is to endure.

When the kidneys fail to function as Nature intended, there is retention of waste that may cause body-wide distress. One may suffer nagging backache, persistent headache, attacks of dizziness, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes—feel tired, nervous, all worn out.

Frequent, scanty or burning passages may be further evidence of kidney or bladder disturbance.

The recognized and proper treatment is a diuretic medicine to help the kidneys get rid of excess poisonous body waste. Use Doan's Pills. They have had more than forty years of public approval. Are endorsed the country over. Insist on Doan's. Sold at all drug stores.

SYNOPSIS

Bryn (James Brynildson III), a tall bronzed young man of wealth, and his chum, Tubby Forbes, are discussing Bryn's coming marriage. Tubby believes it a scheme to get Bryn's wealth from him. Should the girl, Deborah, whom Bryn had met at the office of his attorney, Ted Holworthy, marry Stuart Graham before her twenty-first birthday, she will inherit a vast fortune from her grandfather. Stuart had greatly displeased Deborah, who refuses to marry him. Bryn, posing as an unemployed engineer, offers to marry Deborah, as Stuart, for $50,000, they not to live as man and wife. Twenty-three years previous, Anne Larned had eloped with an adventurer on the day set for her wedding to Courtney Graham. Two days after the birth of her daughter, Anne died. Shortly after, the father died. The Larneds, grandparents, took the child with them to Oregon where, without child companions, Deborah grew up. To safeguard her from some fortune hunter, her grandfather had arranged for her to marry Stuart, son of Courtney Graham, when of age, believing the alliance would be a happy one. When Deborah was fifteen, her grandfather died. Securities had been set aside to keep the family, but a market crash left scarcely enough for them to live on. This was unknown to Deborah's grandmother, an invalid, Gary, a servant, managing the finances. At twenty, the thought of marriage greatly frightens Deborah. It had been planned that Deborah meet Stuart in Frisco, where they were to be married. Tubby and Bryn await Deborah in a hotel in Frisco. Over a period of one year the groom is to prove he is no fortune hunter and can make Deborah happy to the satisfaction of her grandmother. Otherwise the fortune is to go to charity. The will is somewhat ambiguous as to whom Deborah is to marry. The girl arrives with Holworthy. Tubby is surprised to find her charming and sweet. The wedding over, the couple arrives at the home of Deborah's grandmother. The grandmother and Bryn, who she believes to be Stuart, take to one another, which somewhat displeases Deborah, who foresees difficulty when they are to separate after a year. Deborah remonstrates with Bryn for his familiarity and insincerity. Bryn declares he is sincere.

She was gazing into his face. A slow wave of color, quite unlike the angry flush of a short time ago, began to spread up from her throat over her face. She dropped her eyes.

"As for you," Bryn went on calmly, "it would be most presumptuous for me to have any feeling for you whatever. You are, in a sense, my employer. I recognize that. I have no idea of presuming on that relationship. Nothing could be farther from my mind. However—it might be easier for both of us, under the circumstances, if we came to a definite agreement as to my duties and my attitude. Obviously we cannot go on as we began yesterday, or all our plans and sacrifices so far are wasted."

She had turned away and was surveying the eastern horizon. Now she faced him. "Did you make sacrifices to do this for me?" she demanded.

"Nothing of any particular importance," he replied calmly. "Nothing that will not be far outweighed by the benefits I will receive from it. However, a year is a year."

She considered. "I'm afraid I was very thoughtless."

She began to smile. "I suppose there's even another girl somewhere out in the world," she said with a breath of relief. "I am a stupid creature. I might have guessed. It's because we're so self-centered here. To put it perfectly plainly, you have been exerting yourself to the utmost to live up to your bargain, and I've been ridiculous about it. Haven't I? I'm sorry. It's going to be . . ." she bent hastily and lifted her bowl. "I think I have enough," she went on.

Bryn took the bowl. They walked along leisurely toward the house. The sun had suddenly thrown off his veils of cloud and emerged in glory.

Entering the kitchen together, they found Gary there. "This is certainly an early-rising household," remarked Bryn. "'Up with the birds,' must be its motto."

Bryn put down his coffee cup, Gary having served them in the sitting room. He reached into his pocket mechanically for his cigarette case. "Mind if I smoke?"

Across the low round table, Deborah shook her head.

"You told me . . . and Mr. Holworthy told me, too, that . . . that a divorce is easy to get nowadays."

"Very easy."

"I didn't ask you," she went on slowly, "something I should have asked. In Grandmother's day a divorce was dreadful. I'd scarcely heard them mentioned. A divorce was a disgraceful thing. Tell me, is it a disgraceful thing to be divorced? Does it . . . mark one?"

"We can manage it so quietly that no one will know you've been married, Deborah."

"I wasn't thinking exactly of myself," she said, faint color in her cheeks. "Nobody knows me. It wouldn't matter. I was thinking of you. I was wondering if the . . . the girl you . . . that is, the girl you care about won't mind rather dreadfully. I don't quite understand these things," she hurried on, "but I think if I were she I should mind."

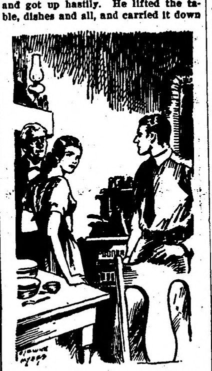
"Did I say I cared about a girl?" Bryn inquired, in surprise.

"Perhaps I saw for myself that there must be one. You spoke of sacrifices. You couldn't have meant your career, because you told me yourself it was at a standstill, and would be assisted by this agreement of ours. And . . . I saw quite a lot of other young men," she said, scarlet, but determined, "and it seems to me that you and your friend, Mr. Forbes, were much the . . . the most attractive. So there must be a girl. I am glad, of course. It will make Gary feel much better. But has the world become so liberal-minded that she won't mind your taking this way to earn money for her?" Her eyes lifted to his, waiting.

Bryn considered. If he said there was no girl, Deborah might take fright again. Gary, thoroughly conscious of the amount of loveliness and charm and innocence which Deborah possessed, would certainly do what he could to spoil this friendliness and trust which were beginning to spring to life.

"I must tell Tubby what you said about him," he said lightly. "He will be extremely flattered, as I am. And grateful. As for your other question—I can assure you that no complication will arise."

She had begun to speak, perhaps to question him further, when a bell tinkled inside the kitchen. She rose hastily. "That's Grandmother," she explained, and hurried down the steps to the narrow side door into the kitchen. Bryn sat down again and lit another cigarette, thinking.



"This Is Certainly an Early-Rising Household," Remarked Bryn.

He recalled himself with a start, and got up hastily. He lifted the table, dishes and all, and carried it down to the kitchen door. He set it inside, went in, and drew it across the big room to the long white porcelain sink beneath the windows. Gary was there, with a big, clean apron tied over his trousers, washing up his own breakfast dishes. Deborah was not in sight.

"It's a beautiful day, Gary."

"Yes, sir. We've days like this all through the summer. It gets very hot in the middle of the day in August, but the nights are always cool."

Bryn picked up a dish-towel. "What are you going to do today, Gary? Can you give me some kind of an idea of your routine? I've got to have something to do, too."

Gary glanced up at him from under his bushy brows. "There's enough to do," he said slowly. "But it's not likely the kind of work you've been used to."

"Well, I can pick cherries. Deborah said you could use them. I suppose the strawberries in the patch have to be picked, too, haven't they? And I heard hens cackling somewhere, although I didn't see them. I presume your fowl have the usual set of signals. So I can collect eggs."

Gary sighed. He rubbed vigorously at a plate. "All them things has to be done," he said. "And there's potatoes to hoe and corn to weed, and cucumbers and melons to water, and raspberries to tie up, and there's some branches of the apricot trees needing propping, I noticed yesterday." He propped his hands on the edge of the sink and looked up. "If you want to work," he said, "there's plenty to be done."

Bryn put a foot on the chair beside the sink. "Had your hands full, hadn't you?" he said.

Gary did not reply. He was still searching Bryn's face. Bryn met his eyes steadily. After a moment Gary turned away, without speaking, and finished washing the sink. He was just untying his apron to hang it up when there was a light footstep at the other end of the room, and Deborah came in. She was very pale, and there was in her face such a look of misery that both men stiffened themselves involuntarily.

"Grandmother liked the strawberries," Deborah said dismally. "She thought they were wonderful." She might have been announcing the end of the world.

"What's happened?" Gary asked again, his face working. "What's the matter, Miss Deborah? Did you tell her? Did she guess about . . ." his eyes went to Bryn.

Deborah shook her head. From her pocket she produced a long sheet of paper. "There," she said tremulously, "That's our marketing list for today."

Hello Everybody

"The Wrong Train"

By FLOYD GIBBONS

YOU know, boys and girls, hope is a wonderful thing, and I'll be doggoned if I know what the human race would do without it. When things look the blackest—when it seems to you that you haven't a chance to pull through—then it's hope that keeps you going until your luck turns or things begin to straighten themselves out.

Hope has saved many a life—and I'm going to tell you about one life it saved, today. The life of a man who got himself into a horrible situation just by taking the wrong train.

The man is Joe Seitsinger of Chicago. One evening late in November, in the year 1907, Joe was standing on the platform of the railroad station in the little town of Tyrone, Okla., waiting for a train. It was a cold night and Joe shivered and pulled his coat tighter about him as he paced up and down that platform.

It Wasn't the Local Train.

Joe was waiting for No. 1—the local—but it was late that evening. Unknown to Joe, it had been sidetracked to let No. 3—the limited—pass it. At last a train came in sight and began to slow down.

That must be the local, Joe thought. The other trains never stopped at little stations like Tyrone. The engine came up to the depot platform, moving very slowly, a string of cars along behind.

The vestibule doors of the cars were still closed, but Joe thought the train would stop in a few seconds and then those doors would open.

To save himself a walk down the platform, he swung aboard one of the cars, standing on the little ledge that protruded from below the closed door, and at the same time, grabbing the two hand holds on either side.

But the train didn't come to a stop. Instead, it rolled right on past the station platform and began to pick up speed!

That's when Joe should have acted. He knew right away that he had made a mistake—realized that he had hopped on the Golden State Limited instead of the local.

"I should have jumped from the train right there," he says, "but I was waiting for a better place to do it. We were gliding over switches and spur tracks at the moment and I was afraid I might trip on them and turn an ankle."

Going Too Fast for Joe to Jump.

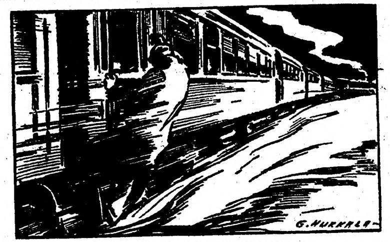
Yes, Joe might even have broken a leg if he'd jumped there and got his feet tangled up with those switches and spurs. But what he did do nearly earned him a broken neck! By the time the train came to a suitable spot in which to jump, it was going so fast that Joe didn't DARE jump. Inside of two minutes it had picked up its full speed and was clipping off the miles at the rate of sixty or more an hour.

And there Joe hung, digging his toes into a little ledge hardly more than an inch wide, on a bitter cold night, while the wind tore at him and threatened to wrench him loose. He pressed his face to the glass door, but he couldn't rap on it. The wind was so strong that he didn't dare let go of either one of the hand holds.



His Plight Was Well Nigh Hopeless.

He yelled—yelled at the top of his voice—but the train was making so much noise and the wind whipped his voice away so fast that no one heard him.

Joe began wondering if he could hang on until the train reached Hooker, the next station, a few miles away. Then, with a sickening sensation in the pit of his stomach he realized that this train didn't even hesitate at Hooker. It's next stop was Dalhart, Tex., ninety miles BEYOND Hooker. And he knew darned good and well that he could never hang on that long.

Hope Was All He Had Left.

"The concussion of the air on my body," he says, "was forcing me back against the rear hand hold. It was bitter cold. I envied every person on that train—whether it was a baby in a comfortable berth, or a bum on the rods beneath the train."

Joe's plight was pretty well nigh hopeless—but hopelessness doesn't stop a guy from hoping. And hope was all Joe had left now. He began hoping the train would, for some reason, stop at Hooker.

The train rolled on. Now it was just a mile outside of Hooker. Now it was coming into the town. It passed Hooker without even slowing down, and zipped right along toward Guymon, the next station on the line. Then Joe began hoping the train would stop at Guymon.

It was a pretty forlorn hope, but it gave Joe something to live for.

"We ran over some pretty rough country in the twenty miles between Hooker and Guymon," he says. "There were a couple of high trestles—dandy places for a fellow in my position to commit suicide if he weren't minded to stick it out and see the natural outcome of the adventure."

But Joe didn't dive off of any trestles. Hope was still with him, telling him the train might stop. And Joe played along, even though he knew Hope was a doggone liar and it would be a miracle if that train stopped anywhere between there and Dalhart.

Then Came the Miracle.

Joe's hands were getting stiff with the cold and he was having difficulty hanging on around the curves. He knew that when they passed Guymon he wouldn't be able to play that game of hope much longer. Soon his numbed hands would let go and he'd just drop off.

They were approaching Guymon now, and Joe figured his time on earth was just about up. The train was roaring down on the station, when suddenly, the miracle happened.

The brakes began to grind—the train began to slow down—and up ahead Joe could see a red light and the arm of a semaphore set at the "stop" signal.

They stopped at the depot, and several men ran out to take Joe down from his insecure perch.

"I was stiff as a board," he says. "My eyes were full of cinders and my face black as coal. I was frozen. I was taken into the depot, thawed out, questioned, and complimented on my luck. When I asked: 'What made her stop?' they showed me a message. Someone at Hooker had seen me and wired ahead."

And the message read: "Man seen hanging on front steps right-hand side fifth coach of Golden Limited. Stop her."

Why Laxatives Fail In Stubborn Constipation

Twelve to 24 hours is too long to wait when relief from clogged bowels and constipation is needed, for then enormous quantities of bacteria accumulate, causing GAS, indigestion and many restless, sleepless nights.

If you want REAL, QUICK RELIEF, take a liquid compound such as Adlerika. Adlerika contains SEVEN cathartic and carminative ingredients that act on the stomach and BOTH bowels. Most "overnight" laxatives contain one ingredient that acts on the lower bowel only.

Adlerika's DOUBLE ACTION gives your system a thorough cleansing, bringing out old poisonous waste matter that may have caused GAS pains, sour stomach, headaches and sleepless nights for months.

Adlerika relieves stomach GAS at once and usually removes bowel congestion in less than two hours. No waiting for overnight results. This famous treatment has been recommended by many doctors and druggists for 35 years. Take Adlerika one-half hour before breakfast or one hour before bedtime and in a short while you will feel marvelously refreshed. At all Leading Druggists.

King George VI.

Queen Elizabeth.

5,000,000 Line London Streets to View Coronation Procession

London, England.—(Special)—A full day of mortal toil for the principals concerned, and a day and night of heroic vigil for thousands of spectators were required before George VI and Elizabeth, his queen, returned to Buckingham palace, full-fledged ruler and consort of Britain by virtue of one of the most splendid and spectacular coronations the world has ever seen.

Five million persons, it was estimated, lined the processional route, over which the King and Queen in the ancient coronation coach rolled solemnly the six and one-half miles from the palace to Westminster abbey in mid-morning and back again in the early evening.

The solemnity of the occasion was observed by the crowd, even by the 300,000, mostly non-Britons, who had come from across the seas to ~~witness it. But the cheers were~~ hale and hearty and the attitude was one of celebration as the roar of the guns in the historic Tower of London split the air of the spring afternoon. It was the signal that George VI had worn upon his head for the first time the Crown of St. Edward, or Crown of England, and called for the cry from 5,000,000 throats as one, "God Save the King!"

Heir presumptive to the most important throne on earth is charming, ten-year-old Princess Elizabeth.

Hotels Sold Out.

This was probably the most important point in the entire coronation ceremony, which was heavily religious throughout and extremely burdensome to the principals as well as to the 9,000 peers and their ladies who gathered in old Westminster abbey to do homage to their king and to display for one day jewels and trappings the cost of which ran far into the millions.

It was the climax of the occasion for which souvenir manufacturers had been planning for many months; for which every hotel and boarding house room in London and its environs was sold out; for which apartments rented up to $3,000 for a single day; for which the government had spent $2,600,000, with a prospect of getting back perhaps $400,000 from the sale of seats along the processional route at $2 to $250 a head.

Souvenir manufacturers, distracted at first over the abdication of King Edward VIII—for they had struck his likeness off on millions of medals, spoons, plates and other articles—later became jubilant. For the souvenir collectors were so anxious to obtain the mistaken souvenirs that the latter sold at a premium.

That the sentiment for the crown, which is the chief bond holding the Empire together, lives healthy and strong was apparent from the thousands who, not being able to afford reserved seats, took their stand along the curbs long before the setting of the sun on May 11. All night they had to stick to their watch and all the next day. Yet they did not even see the coronation ceremony itself. They witnessed only the procession as it passed up the Mall.

Queen Precedes King.

The ceremony at the abbey was only for the peerage, the persons of royal blood and the king's representatives. With the clergy, they were waiting at the west door of the handsome Gothic edifice, taking their places inside as the approach of the coronation coach, an ornate vehicle made for Queen Anne in 1761, was noted. Once inside they were doomed to sit for seven hours in their heavy trappings of crimson or purple velvet and ermine, never moving from the 19-inch seat spaces allotted them until the end of the day, after the King and Queen had departed.

When the coach pulled up, Queen Elizabeth proceeded ahead to the recognition chairs, there to await her lord. When King George entered, to the sound of anthems and prayers, he was introduced to the four sides of the assemblage by the archbishop of Canterbury, who assumed the mastery of the ceremonies from that point on.

It was the archbishop who, a few minutes later, was to ask the king: "Sir, is your Majesty willing to take the oath?" The king answered, according to the ritual, "I am willing," and the Archbishop questioned him:

"Will you solemnly promise and swear to govern the peoples of Great Britain, Ireland, Canada, Australia, New Zealand and the Union of South Africa, of your possessions and the other territories to any of them belonging or pertaining, and of your Empire of India, according to their respective laws and customs?"

"I solemnly promise to do so," the king replied.

"Will you to your power cause law and justice, in mercy, to be executed in all your judgments?" the archbishop asked. And the king replied, "I will." He promised further to uphold the clergy and the Church of England.

King Given His Vestments.

There followed a long drawn out communion service during which the king was presented with the various jewels with which the office vests him, and was anointed upon the hands, breast and face with the holy oil. Among the jewels presented him were the staff and sceptre, with the cross and golden spurs, handed down from the time of St. Edward; the three jeweled swords signifying mercy, temporal justice and spiritual justice; the king's sceptre with the dove symbolic of mercy and equity; the sword of state; the king's gold and diamond orb, surmounted by the Christian cross; the crown of state and the imperial crown of India. The jewels used in the ceremonies are reputed to be worth at least $25,000,000.

Then as the king kneeled before the altar, the archbishop placed the Crown of St. Edward upon his head, but only for a fleeting moment for its weight is unbearable. He prayed:

"God crown you with a crown of glory and righteousness, that by the ministry of this our benediction, having a right faith and manifold fruit of good works, you may obtain the crown of an everlasting kingdom by the gift of him whose kingdom endureth forever."

The choir sang:

"Be strong and play the man; keep the commandments of the Lord thy God, and walk in His ways."

Solemn, thought-provoking advice for the man who must wear the crown of one of the most important nations on earth in times when the seething caldron of the world's hate threatens hourly to boil over.

Parading the Fashions

A STYLE show De Luxe for De Ladies on this De Lightful Spring day!

Betty Ann feels just a bit the most elegant of the three for her housecoat is superlative. She has "skirts" like the ladies in the feminine yesterdays; her basque is form-fitting; her sash has a bow, and her sleeves puff. The illusion is so perfect that she is about to reach for smelling salts or a sprig of old lavender.

Matrons Have Vanity, Too.

Mama, very young for her years, can not resist styles that bring more compliments her way. The no-belt feature of this one is definitely new, and does wonders for the figure a bit past the slim stage. The continuing collar, which in soft pastels is always flattering, gives the break required by the all-in-one waist and skirt. The fitted top and flaring bottom make for style plus comfort, a demand matrons, even though youthful, always make.

Parties and Picnics.

Winifred on the left is privately making up her mind to have a housecoat, too; though she is mightily pleased with the way her print has turned out. She chose this style because the fitted, broken waist line and front seamed skirt are so very slenderizing. She's on her way to the 4-H meeting now and has only stopped to remind Betty Ann of the picnic "The Jolly Twelve" are having on Tuesday.

IN MEMORIAM

In memory of our dear husband and father, Ole J. Backlund who passed to his eternal rest, May 12, 1936.

One year has passed since that sad day,
The one we loved was called away.
When the evening shadows are falling
And with our thoughts we sit alone
To our hearts comes this longing
If he only would come home.
But though our hearts are broken with sorrow
With grief so hard to bear,
We will meet you, some bright tomorrow
In the upper garden there.

The students of the Biology class are making out tests to give their fellow-classmen. This is a form of review for their finals.

The English classes took their spelling finals this week.

Someone wonders what the agitation is going on among the Juniors. They're highly important and one can't blame them if they do want a day dedicated to them.

Going back to exams, some of the students seem to be worrying about them. Two students were discussing another. "So he is worrying about exams." "Yes he has so many wrinkles in his forehead that when he puts on his hat he screws it on."

We wonder who this could have been.

Mr. Karvonen: Five nights a week is too much for anyone. Biology student: It wasn't five. I was out seven." We have ideas

Two recent cases in Chicago: Overland bus driver, enroute, suddenly collapsed at wheel. An alert passenger sitting next to him grabbed the wheel and stopped the bus, probably preventing a serious smahup.

In another instance, a father, sitting at the wheel beside his son, suffered a heart attack, slumped over the wheel and died almost immediately.

Such cases certainly emphasize the necessity for drivers keeping in first-class condition at all times through right living and periodic physical examinations. When you check up on your motor, check up on yourself.

Coronation of George Is London's Great Spectacle

CLAD in a cloth of gold robe embroidered with colored emblems and lined with white satin, King George VI of Great Britain knelt before the archbishop of Canterbury in Westminster abbey and the primate placed on the monarch's head the crown which Edward never wore. Then the queen's crown was placed on the head of Elizabeth, and the two took their places on their thrones. At the same time all the assembled peers and peeresses donned their coronets, drums and trumpets sounded and the guns at the Tower of London boomed. This was the climax of the grand spectacle that had attracted many thousands of persons to London and that held the attention of the world for a few hours.

King George VI

First of the day's events was the procession to the abbey, which was observed by vast throngs in the streets, windows and stands. It was two miles long. The lord mayor of London, gorgeously clad and carrying the city mace, arrived first at the annex built at the abbey entrance, and was followed closely by the speaker of the house of commons, representatives of foreign governments, the prime ministers of the dominions and the princes and princesses of royal blood. Next came Queen Mary, and then King George and Queen Elizabeth.

When all the fortunate ones entitled to places in the abbey had taken their seats, the ceremony began with the ancient "recognition" ritual; the archbishop of Canterbury presented the king to the people, and four times the throng responded with "God Save King George." After the rite of coronation and the actual enthronement of the monarchs the doors of the abbey were thrown open, George and Elizabeth, wearing their crowns and carrying their scepters, stepped into their coach, and the second grand procession made its slow way to Buckingham palace.

Every detail of the spectacle and ceremony had been rehearsed until all were perfect in their parts and nothing marred the performance upon which the British government spent about $2,000,000. It really was a gorgeous show and no one begrudged the money it cost, especially as visitors to London spent probably ten times as much. Though in general ancient routine was followed, there were some notable concessions to modernity. For instance, the abbey was equipped with telephones and loud speakers. Another innovation, on the days before the coronation, was the stationing of companies of soldiers from the various dominions as sentries at Buckingham and St. James' palaces. Never before had this duty been entrusted to other than the British guards.

Queen Elizabeth

Throughout the British empire coronation day was celebrated with parades and banquets, and wherever on earth as many as two Britishers came together, George VI was toasted.

In a chateau near Tours, France, Edward, duke of Windsor, sat before a radio listening to a broadcast of the coronation ceremonies; and by his side was Wallis Warfield, his fiancee, for whom he surrendered his throne.

It was announced that Wallis had formally dropped the name Simpson and would be known as Mrs. Wallis Warfield.

Merrill and Lambie Fly Across the Atlantic

FIRST of this year's airplane flights across the Atlantic ocean was made by Dick Merrill and his co-pilot, Jack Lambie. They flew from New York to Croydon airport near London in 21 hours 2 minutes, setting a new record despite the fact that they had to land first at North Weald, Essex, to obtain directions. Merrill said they had bad weather with rain all the way, but their Lockheed-Electra monoplane behaved perfectly. The flyers were under contract to start back with photographs of the coronation immediately after that event, regardless of weather conditions.

Congress May Adjourn or Recess in July

BECAUSE the economy movement in congress makes undesirable the enactment of much social legislation that had been planned, the law makers find they haven't much business to do. Therefore they are getting ready for adjournment early in July, or at least a recess until autumn. Vice President Garner and House Majority Leader Sam Rayburn are foremost in the planning for adjournment. Senator Joe Robinson, senate majority leader, is so sure congress will quit soon that he has engaged passage to Europe for July for himself and Mrs. Robinson.

If, after the return of President Roosevelt from his fishing trip, no compromise agreement on the Supreme court enlargement plan can be reached, congress probably will take a long recess and resume the fight over that measure in the fall. Senator Burton K. Wheeler of Montana, leader of the opposition, said some of the proponents of the plan told him of the possibility of putting the bill over until the autumn, and he interpreted this as a sign of weakness.

George Berry Appointed Senator From Tennessee

GEORGE LEONARD BERRY, veteran labor leader who has been serving as President Roosevelt's "co-ordinator for industrial co-operation," whatever that may mean, is now United States senator from Tennessee, having been appointed by Governor Browning to fill out the term of the late Senator Nathan L. Bachman. He will serve until the regular election in November, 1938.

George L. Berry

Mr. Berry, who is fifty-three years old, is one of the largest landholders in the South. He owns a weekly newspaper at Rogersville, Tenn., and the International Playing Card and Label company. He has been president of the International Printing Pressmen and Assistants Union of North America since he was twenty years old.

The new senator has been one of President Roosevelt's most ardent supporters, and was himself considered for nomination for the vice presidency in 1924.

Death Takes Harry New, Ex-Postmaster General

HARRY S. NEW, one of Indiana's well known citizens, died in Johns Hopkins hospital, Baltimore, at the age of seventy-nine. He had lived at Chevy Chase, Md., since his retirement from active work in 1929, but the body was taken back to Indianapolis for burial. Mr. New rose from reporter to publisher of the Indianapolis Journal, and in later years he was head of the Bedford Stone and Construction company. However, he was best known in the field of politics and public service. He was chairman of the Republican national committee in 1907-08, senator from Indiana from 1917 to 1923, and then served as postmaster general under President Harding, establishing the first transcontinental air mail. From 1923 to 1925 Mr. New was grand consul of the Sigma Chi fraternity.

Mabel Boardman Honored by the Red Cross

MISS MABEL T. BOARDMAN was the guest of honor at the dinner of the American Red Cross during the annual convention in Washington, and she richly deserved that distinction and all the fine things that were said about her. For Miss Boardman was closing her thirty-seventh year of service with the organization, during which time she never has accepted either salary or expense money. Such selfless devotion to a humanitarian cause is not often met with and it is most seemly that it should be recognized. Since 1900 Miss Boardman has raised more than $2,000,000 in gifts to the Red Cross.

"My satisfaction is in developing things," the tall, impressive national secretary and volunteer service head, explained. "I don't care very much for static things."

New Roman Empire Marks Its First Birthday

PREMIER MUSSOLINI gave the people of Rome a fine spectacle in celebration of the first anniversary of the new Roman empire, and at the same time he warned the world not to interfere with "the thousands of years old civilizing mission of Italy" in Africa. The big parade which King Victor Emmanuel and the Duce reviewed was given vivid color by the detachments of native troops from Eritrea, Somaliland, Libya and Ethiopia, on Arab horses, on camels and afoot. With them were the mechanized forces of the regular Italian army.

Gibes in the London press at the Italian troops who were defeated in several engagements in Spain so vexed Mussolini that he barred from Italy all but three of the London newspapers and ordered all Italian correspondents in London to return home at once.

Trying to Solve Explosion of the Hindenburg

SEVERAL investigations into the disaster that befell the huge German dirigible Hindenburg were started, the most important being that of the air commerce bureau. There was not much in the blackened skeleton of the airship at Lakehurst, N. J., from which could be obtained an explanation of the explosion that brought it down in blazing ruin, killing 34 of its passengers and crew and one spectator. Among the theories the most likely was that the airship's hydrogen gas was ignited either by static electricity that ran up the landing lines or by backfire from a stern motor.

The airship, just arrived from Europe on its first transatlantic trip of the year, was about to land when there was an explosion toward the stern. Instantly flames broke out and ran the length of the ship. The tail sagged first, then the nose crashed down and the split sections telescoped as they fell. A few of the 44 passengers and some members of the crew were able to jump to safety, but many of the others aboard hadn't a chance for their lives. The navy men of the ground crew heroically plunged into the flaming wreckage and dragged out those victims who could be reached.

Among the victims of the disaster was Capt. Ernst Lehmann, who piloted the Hindenburg last year. He had relinquished the command to Capt. William Pruss but was aboard in an advisory capacity. He was terribly burned and died in a hospital. Captain Pruss was severely injured.

It was officially announced in Berlin that another airship would resume the service to North America in the autumn. It is now under construction.

Hopkins Insists on Having Huge Sum for Relief

HOW to economize by cutting down government expenditures, as the President has demanded, and at the same time to continue with such huge expenditures as the billion and a half dollars Mr. Roosevelt asked for relief is a puzzle that congress doesn't know how to solve. Harry Hopkins, Works Progress administrator and most accomplished spender of the administration, took a hand in the discussion, telling a house appropriation subcommittee that unemployment is a permanent problem, that the government should be prepared to support 7,000,000 jobless persons at all times, and consequently that congress must appropriate the billion and a half for relief instead of cutting the sum down to a billion.

H. L. Hopkins

Both Democrats and Republicans on the committee protested, and Chairman Woodrum of Virginia told Hopkins he would use every endeavor to have the appropriation reduced by at least a third.

Senator William H. King of Utah, Democrat, not only disagrees with Hopkins as to the amount needed for relief, but isn't satisfied with the way the administrator has been conducting the work. He introduced resolutions in the senate calling for an investigation of the works progress administration and taking the future spending of relief money out of Hopkins' hands. King said his purpose was to abolish the WPA.

In the house economy received a wallop on the head when the reforestation bill was passed, 171 to 153. This measure would appropriate $2,500,000 annually for government aid to farmers who wish to turn part of their farms into woodlands. It was fought by a bloc led by Representative J. J. Cochran of Missouri, Democrat. "It has a worth while objective, but it is one of those expensive measures which we can defer passing for a while until the budget is in balance," declared Cochran.

Special Foreign Rights in Egypt Are Ended

EGYPT took another step toward complete independence when a convention was officially signed at Montreaux, Switzerland, terminating foreign "capitulations" or special foreign rights in the land of the Nile. Special courts for trying foreigners in Egypt will be gradually abolished during a twelve year transition period. Freedom for American scientists to carry on their work in Egypt, including excavations at Luxor and Sakara, is guaranteed, and all American educational, medical and charitable institutions will be permitted to continue their activities.

All foreign voice in the making of law in Egypt will end on October 15, 1937, and foreigners thenceforth will be subject to Egyptian laws and taxes.

Italian Aviator Sets New Altitude Record

ONE of Italy's fine aviators, Col. Mariox Pezzi, set a new altitude record for airplanes by flying to a height of 15,655 meters, or 51,361 feet. The former record of 15,223 meters was held by R. F. D. Swain of England.

Colonel Pezzi, who commands the military altitude school at Monte Carlo, used a Caproni biplane powered with a 14-cylinder, 700-horsepower Piaggio engine. He reported encountering a temperature of 65.2 degrees below zero Fahrenheit.

SYNOPSIS

Bryn (James Brynildson III), a tall bronzed young man of wealth, and his chum, Tubby Forbes, are discussing Bryn's coming marriage. Tubby believes it a scheme to get Bryn's wealth from him. Should the girl, Deborah, whom Bryn had met at the office of his attorney, Ted Holworthy, marry Stuart Graham before her twenty-first birthday, she will inherit a vast fortune from her grandfather. Stuart had greatly displeased Deborah, who refuses to marry him. Bryn, posing as an unemployed engineer, offers to marry Deborah, as Stuart, for $50,000, they not to live as man and wife. Twenty-three years previous, Anne Larned had eloped with an adventurer on the day set for her wedding to Courtney Graham. Two days after the birth of her daughter, Anne died. Shortly after, the father died. The Larneds, grandparents, took the child with them to Oregon where, without child companions, Deborah grew up. To safeguard her from some fortune hunter, her grandfather had arranged for her to marry Stuart, son of Courtney Graham, when of age, believing the alliance would be a happy one. When Deborah was fifteen, her grandfather died. Securities had been set aside to keep the family, but a market crash left scarcely enough for them to live on. This was unknown to Deborah's grandmother, an invalid. Gary, a servant, managing the finances. At twenty, the thought of marriage greatly frightens Deborah. It had been planned that Deborah meet Stuart in Frisco, where they were to be married. Tubby and Bryn await Deborah in a hotel in Frisco. Over a period of one year the groom is to prove he is no fortune hunter and can make Deborah happy to the satisfaction of her grandmother. Otherwise the fortune is to go to charity. The will is somewhat ambiguous as to whom Deborah is to marry. The girl arrives with Holworthy. Tubby is surprised to find her charming and sweet. The wedding over, the couple arrives at the home of Deborah's grandmother. The grandmother and Bryn, who she believes to be Stuart, take to one another, which somewhat displeases Deborah, who foresees difficulty when they are to separate after a year. Deborah remonstrates with Bryn for his familiarity and insincerity. Bryn declares he is sincere. Deborah believes Bryn has a sweetheart waiting for him.

—9—

"Marketing list?" Gary repeated, with utter horror. He stared at the paper as if it were a message of destruction from Mars.

"Five dozen wax tapers, of the best quality," Gary read out. "A cook and three housemaids."

Gary groaned.

"Copies of all the modern magazines, particularly those relating to ladies' fashions and the new methods of entertaining."

Deborah swallowed.

"A plumber to inspect all the plumbing of the house. A man to put the electric plant in order."

"A catalogue of comfortable motor cars."

"Four or five gardeners."

"A man who understands horses, knows where they may be obtained, and can care for them."

Bryn looked up with amused eyes. "You're evidently going to be taught to ride, Deborah." His eyes went again to the list.

"Ten pounds of the best Jasmine tea."

"Eight dollars a pound," Gary breathed. "That's her special blend."

"A cow, or sufficient cows to give plenty of rich cream."

"Well," Bryn said after a moment, "it's a fairly good beginning. I don't suppose she's heard of electric refrigerators, or vacuum cleaners, or radios, or any number of other modern inventions. The magazines will undoubtedly help, unless we go over them first and cut out all the advertisements."

Deborah sprang up. "Oh, what's the use of all this?" she cried. "I won't have you laughing at her. It's no use making fun. She thinks . . . she thinks we can manage anything now. She doesn't know. However am I going to tell her? What am I going to do?"

Gary turned away and began to walk up and down the floor, desperate. Deborah ran to the door and stood gazing out over the lovely peace and quiet of the June morning.

"It's all we can do to pay the taxes," Gary said at last.

There was a silence.

Deborah came back to the table. "I'll have to pretend I'm ill," she said. "I'll have to say I've a pain in my heart, or something like that. Something that can't stand excitement. That's the only thing."

Gary stared at her. But it was Bryn who objected. "You might as well tell her the truth," he said, "because specialists come high. We wouldn't be any better off."

"Let's tell her the truth," Gary said sharply. "Let's tell her, Miss Deborah. We're getting in too deep."

Bryn rose and said, "the way out has just occurred to me. Mr. Holworthy."

Deborah caught her breath. "What could he do?"

"He knows the circumstances. He could advance us the money we need."

"But will he?"

"We can try. I think he will. In the meantime, we can buy the smaller things. . . . I have a little money of my own, a few hundreds. I am happy to put them at our mutual disposal. And when we go into town, Deborah, we can mail a letter to Mr. Holworthy."

"We can't take your money."

"Nonsense. Of course you can take my money. You can give me a note, if you like, and pay me interest. I can't possibly use it myself up here, can I? So it's settled."

Gary drew a deep breath of relief. "I'd thought of borrowing before," he said. "But until Miss Deborah was married, we didn't have any prospects of paying it back. Now it's all right. I can see it's all right. If you don't mind lending what you have, sir."

"I don't like borrowing," Deborah continued to protest, her cheeks flaming. "We're taking enough from you. We can't take any more."

Gary turned toward her. "If we don't go through with it, if you tell your grandmother now, then this gentleman won't get his money at the end of the year. You know what your grandmother will do. You know how terrified she is of fortune hunters. She can't keep a little bit of the money for you, and she'd be afraid to keep it all. She wouldn't recognize this marriage. It's too late to marry anybody else; your birthday is past. If we told your grandmother the whole truth, that your . . . the man you've married is a stranger, paid to marry you, she would die. It would kill her. And then, maybe you could get the money, but it would kill your grandmother."

Deborah listened, her eyes dark and smouldering. She lifted them at last to Bryn. "So it's just as a safeguard for yourself that you're offering your money?" she asked icily.

"Something of the sort," Bryn said with truth.

CHAPTER IV

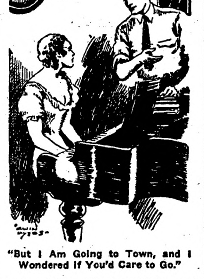
Bryn went upstairs to the south wing where his own room lay. He entered, sat down at the small writing table before the window, lifted the leather case from the floor beside him, unlocked it, took out writing paper, and began a letter to Tubby. After the usual jocular greetings Bryn asked him to procure ten pounds of jasmine tea from an old Chinese friend of theirs, a cook from an employment agency, three housemaids and a butler.

With the letter sealed in his pocket, Bryn went down the stairs in search of Deborah. He heard from the front of the house the sound of the piano. He went slowly toward the drawing room, listening. The piano was being banged with fury. Either Deborah or Grandmother was playing the "Norwegian Bridal Procession" in such a way that it sounded like the march on Paris.

He knocked lightly on the drawing room door, but the piano did not stop. He opened the door and went in. Deborah was pouncing angrily on handfuls of keys and making them wince in pain. Bryn stood for a moment watching her. He was restraining an impulse to walk forward, slip his arms underneath her, lift her from the stool and hold her firmly against him while she kicked and stormed and raged at him, while he looked down into her dark eyes, smiling, waiting for her anger to subside. There would be a moment then when she would lie, limp and beaten, in his arms; and then, with her face at his shoulder and her hair shaken loose over his arm, he could . . .



"But I Am Going to Town, and I Wondered If You'd Care to Go."

The music stopped abruptly, in the middle of a bar. Her hands dropped to her lap, and she stared at him, mute and angry.

"Sorry to interrupt." Bryn said; "the music was beautiful. Such expression. But I'm going in to town, and I wondered if you'd care to go."

"No."

"It's a long drive alone," Bryn said plaintively.

"I'm sorry." She got up from the piano stool with a swish of starched skirt. "You may add something extra to your bill for the trip," she said coldly, and turned and went from the room without a backward glance.

He went upstairs again and knocked on Grandmother's door. She opened it promptly.

"I have to go to town in the car," Bryn told her. "Would you care to put on your bonnet and come? We could be back by dinner time."

Her eyes opened wide. "Go to Lynndale? I? In the car?"

"The road is pretty rough, but I'll drive carefully. Come on, Grandmother, let's go on a bust."

"Why . . . I don't know." Her hands fluttered helplessly. "I haven't been away from here for many years."

"You'll be comfortable. Really," promised Bryn.

She lifted her chin. She drew a deep breath. "Very well," she said at last.

"Come exactly as you are, Grandmother. I'll give you five minutes, and not another second. Five minutes."

Milk Puddings—Orange peel shredded very finely makes an excellent flavoring for milk puddings. It is a pleasant change from nutmeg when added to rice pudding or baked custard.

* * *

Fitting Your Hat—If you have a tight felt hat, hold it in the steam of a boiling kettle. When the felt is thoroughly damp it is easy to stretch it to the right size.

* * *

Making Cocoa—Cocoa loses that raw taste if made with half milk and half water, then boiled. More nutritious and digestible, too.

* * *

Save Stockings—If stockings persistently wear out at the toes, try buying them one-half size larger.

* * *

Rust Remover—Onion juice will remove rust from tableware.

* * *

Stewed Macaroni—Boil one pound macaroni in milk and water for three-quarters of an hour, adding one-fourth ounce butter, salt, and an onion stuck with cloves. Afterwards, drain the macaroni, add three ounces grated cheese, a little nutmeg, pepper, and a little milk or cream. Stew gently for five minutes and serve very hot.

* * *

Devilled Egg Lillies—Hard cook as many eggs as there are to be servings. Chill, then peel carefully. With a sharp knife cut strips from the large end to the center; remove yolks, mash and season with salt, pepper, mayonnaise and a little Worcestershire sauce. Carefully refill cavities having the white strips form the petals of the "lily." Lay each on a bed of curly endive. Accompany with cheese straws.

Cleaning Combs, Brushes—A teaspoon of ammonia in a quart of water will remove all grease and dirt from combs and brushes, after which they should be rinsed and dried in the sun.

Don't Sleep When Gas Presses Heart
If you want to really GET RID OF GAS and terrible bloating, don't expect to do it by just doctoring your stomach with harsh, irritating alkalies and "gas tablets." Most GAS is lodged in the stomach and upper intestine and is due to old poisonous matter in the constipated bowels that are loaded with ill-causing bacteria.
If your constipation is of long standing, enormous quantities of dangerous bacteria accumulate. Then your digestion is upset. GAS often presses heart and lungs, making life miserable.
You can't eat or sleep. Your head aches. Your back aches. Your complexion is sallow and pimply. Your breath is foul. You are a sick, grouchy, wretched unhappy person. YOUR SYSTEM IS POISONED.
Thousands of sufferers have found in Adlerika the quick, scientific way to rid their systems of harmful bacteria. Adlerika rids you of gas and cleans foul poisons out of BOTH upper and lower bowels. Give your bowels a REAL cleansing with Adlerika. Get rid of GAS. Adlerika does not gripe—is not habit forming. At all Leading Druggists.

For Dress and Utility

"Just you wait, Miss, till I grow up! Your clothes won't have a look in because I've already begun to Sew-My-Own. All right. I'm going."

And so on well into the afternoon!

SNOW - WIND - SLEET
Electric Lines Go Down
Communication Systems Out of Order and Highways Blocked

The recent storm extending over parts of the Dakotas, Minnesota, Iowa, and Nebraska interupted electric service in many communities because of damaged transmission lines and distribution systems.

Repair crews were hastily organized, some being sent from distant points to aid in restoring service. With highways blocked by impassable snowdrifts, the transportation of men and material was delayed. In some cases it was impossible to get into some communities for three or more days. Several trucks were stormbound or disabled, bucking snowdrifts.

Temporary repairs have been made and service restored but there now follows the making of permanent replacement of many miles of transmission lines, of hundreds of poles totally destroyed, together with the renewing of hundreds of miscellaneous small parts such as crossarms, insulators, pins, etc. The damage will amount to many thousands of dollars, the exact extent of which we cannot determine until permanent reconstruction is completed.

We deeply appreciate the patience and understanding of our customers while awaiting restoration of service. We thank you and hope it will not happen again.

—10—

"Really," she said helplessly, but he did not wait. He ran downstairs and out to the car. He started the motor, turned the car carefully, came to a halt again at the door, and Grandmother was there, her breath coming and going with excitement, the hat perched at a careful angle, a pair of gloves in her hands. Bryn lifted her gently and put her down in the car.

Bryn stopped the car at the gate. He pushed the button of the horn. A long melodious call rang out. Instantly Deborah appeared on the little balcony before her room. Bryn opened Grandmother's door, and the old lady leaned out. She waved her handkerchief at the girl.

"I'm going to town, dear," she cried in her thin old voice, and sank back again with a sigh. And Bryn smiled behind his hand at the expression of horrified incredulity that had come over Deborah's face, an expression which, fortunately, her grandmother could not see.

Bryn had finished all the important business which had brought him to town. He had been to the bank, had identified himself as the owner of the account transferred from San Francisco a few days ago, and had been bowed out obsequiously by the manager himself. He had been to the post-office and had posted Tubby's letter, as well as a terse one of his own to Holworthy. He had taken Deborah's letter to the lawyer from his pocket, looked at it, hesitated, and then with a smile had opened and read it. Not exactly a businesslike document, but clear and to the point. At the bottom a name was signed, and as he read it he received a severe shock.

"Deborah Mayne Brynildson."

Deborah Mayne Brynildson. Deborah was his wife. She had taken his name. She was conscious of her position, far more conscious than he was. Deborah Mayne Brynildson . . . somehow the fact that she bore his name hadn't occurred to him. Poor little Deborah. Perhaps she hated that name.

Grandmother was waiting in the car. She had been sitting there ever since Bryn had parked the car when they had reached town, her eyes wide and excited. From time to time he came back to her, two or three times followed by white-aproned clerks with their arms piled high with packages which they placed in the trunk at the rear of the long car.

"Now," he said, with a foot on the running board, "how would you like to come out and stroll down the street, Grandmother? Nothing shall happen to you. I promise."

She looked up, her eyes sparkling. For a second she looked astonishingly like Deborah. "I . . . I don't think I would be afraid, Stuart," she said haltingly.

Bryn came to a sudden decision. He took her hand lightly in its black glove. "Will you do me a tremendous favor?"

"Certainly, my boy."

"Do you mind calling me by the name I've always been called? If you can believe it, almost nobody has ever used the name Stuart. Could you bring yourself to call me Bryn? It's what my friends say, and I scarcely know myself by 'Stuart.'"

"It's very strange," she said thoughtfully. "I don't understand why you're called Bryn. But I don't mind using it. As a matter of fact . . . 'Bryn, Bryn,'" she repeated. "You know, my boy, it suits you, somehow. 'Stuart' doesn't. I always felt queer saying it. 'Bryn.'"

"Thank you, Grandmother. You know how it is. When you aren't accustomed to a name . . ."

He opened the door wider, and waited. She gave a little fluttering breath and emerged slowly from her long retreat. She stepped out into the world with a hesitating air; but as she took the arm he offered and crossed the curb, she drew herself up slightly, and became once more the shadow of an assured woman of the world.

Both together they saw the hat in the window. It was a small window, glitteringly clean, and the hat hung inside the window. It was a small window, of a tiny millinery shop at the end of the street.

On a pedestal in the center was one hat, a molded toque of gray velvet the exact shade of Grandmother's hair. Bryn felt her hand move on his arm. He looked at the hat, and then down at her face. He turned, slowly, without a word, and they went into the little shop.

"The hat in the window, please," he said. The girl put the soft gray toque on the silvered hair. Grandmother, startled, looked at herself in the glass, and then turned to Bryn. Her eyes were deep blue and shining; her cheeks were pink.

"We will take it," he told the girl, and handed her a bill.

"And now," he said happily, "now let's go shopping."

Grandmother was a little intoxicated. She made no protests whatever. She clung tightly to his arm and followed where he led, and Bryn enjoyed himself thoroughly. He bought her a long soft gray woollen coat. He took her to a florist's and bought her a bunch of purple, scented violets to pin on the new coat. He bought her five pairs of gray gloves and a gray suede purse to match. Grandmother, by the time they were through, was twenty years younger, and the pain in her heart had entirely disappeared.

They proceeded down the street toward the car. "I've got one or two more things to buy," he decided, and went into a confectioner's. Grandmother accompanied him and stood waiting.

"I want," he told the proprietor, "a very nice box of chocolates and a pound of your best tobacco and a good pipe."

The proprietor knew what was meant. The articles were selected and paid for. He placed Grandmother carefully in the seat and got in himself.

On the sidewalk in front of the car a small boy in clean faded blue overalls came slowly along with a very small dog on the end of a leash. The dog shone like silk in the late afternoon sun. It sniffed the sidewalk happily.

The boy's eye caught Bryn. He called out. "You don't want to buy a good dog, do you, mister? This here one's for sale. Two dollars."

"What is it, a cocker spaniel?" Bryn inquired, regarding the floppy ears, the water-waved coat, the thumping tail.

"Yessir, a real cocker. Ain't that a pretty color?"

"What's the matter with it?"

"Well," the boy told him, dropping his voice, "it's a lady dog. And," confidentially, "you know what they're like."

"Oh. A lady dog. What's her name?"

"Garbo." The boy grinned. "Just take a look at her." He made a little clucking noise with his tongue. Instantly the dog sat up, paws crossed limply before her, mouth closed, silky ears drooping, her eyes sad and mournful and pleading. Bryn looked. He began to laugh, silently.

"Well," Bryn decided, "she's sold. Here's your money."

CHAPTER V

Bryn, on the morning after his trip to town with Grandmother, paused in his systematic and careful examination of the grounds, leaned against a tree down at the lower corner, lit a cigarette, and considered.

The men who were coming out from town to make a garden out of this wilderness would have to work carefully. All through the thick grass were scattered rare shrubs, beds of flowering plants, plots of hyacinth and crocus bulbs, crescents of iris set into the corners.

But his main consideration was not directed toward the garden. He was remembering Deborah's face when they had returned yesterday, he and Grandmother. White and cold, she had met them in the doorway and led Grandmother into the small sitting room to rest for a moment before removing her new coat and hat. Deborah was no longer angry. While they were away she had obviously come to some agreement with herself; Bryn decided, as she smiled faintly and took the box of chocolates, as she put it down without a glance upon the small table beside her, that he preferred her angry. He had swung on his heel, leaving her there with Grandmother, and gone out to Gary. Gary stood in the drive, his parcel laid on the grass, watching the puppy rolling over and over, wild with excitement, and yelping with joy at her release from the car.

"Perhaps you'll tell Miss Deborah that the puppy is for her," Bryn said curtly, and went back up to his room.

But the puppy wasn't having any difficulty in penetrating these frosty layers and discovering the real Deborah. From his window yesterday afternoon Bryn had witnessed their first meeting. Deborah had come out to Gary, and at her appearance the puppy had rushed upon her with a ferocious threatening growl which ended precipitately as the little dog fell over her own feet and tumbled in a heap before Deborah's. Instantly, unquestioning as a child, she had bent to lift it in her arms. "Oh, Gary," she cried, "isn't it a darling? Isn't it a darling puppy?"

She hugged it close, and it snuggled for a moment comfortably under her chin. Then it put out a pink tongue and kissed Deborah entirely without reserve.

"You're a bad dog," she scolded, but her voice was soft and laughing and tender. Bryn drew a deep breath. When she spoke to him her voice wasn't like that. "Where did it come from, Gary?"

"She's for you, Miss Deborah. Mr. Bryn brought her out from town."

"Oh," Deborah said. "Of course. I might have known." But she did not drop the puppy. She stood silent, thinking.

"Now look, Miss Deborah," Gary began, "I don't think he means any harm, after all. He's only acting natural."

"Oh, hush!" Deborah cried stormily, stamping her foot. She held the puppy close and ran off with her, back of the house, down to some hidden nook of her own which always seemed to be her chosen place of refuge.

That had been yesterday.

Bryn went down and got into the car, standing on the drive. He drew from his pocket the worn piece of paper which . . . was it only yesterday morning? . . . had caused Deborah such woe.

His eyes traveled down the list on the paper in his hand. Magazines, catalogues, tea, servants. Gardeners, yes. The bank manager was sending them out as soon as he could find them.

Gary came out to him.

"I must say," he said to Bryn, "you got a way of getting things done. And . . . I'd like to thank you for that tobacco, sir."

"I suppose the electric light situation is next," Bryn said, unheeding. "Well, I think I can fix that myself. Several years of engineering ought to prove of some value. Lead on, Gary."

What Irvin S. Cobb Thinks about

The Gabble of Tourists.

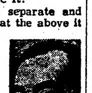
GRAND CANYON, ARIZ.—It gets on your nerves to stand on the rim of this scenic wonder and hear each successive tourist say, "Well, if any artist painted it just as it is nobody would believe it!"



Irvin S. Cobb

After I heard 174 separate and distinct tourists repeat the above it got on my nerves and I sought surcease far from the maddening round-tripper, hoping to escape the commonplace babbling of eastern sight-seers and revel in the salty humor of the unspoiled West. And I ran into a native who said, with the cute air of having just thought it up, "Yes, sir, I never felt better or had less."

And I encountered a gentleman who in parting called out, "Say, kid, don't take in any wooden nickels." And then, speaking of someone else, remarked, "If I never see that guy again it'll be too soon."

• • •

Renaming Hors d'Oeuvres.

THE controversy over giving a more American name to hors d'oeuvres—which some cannot pronounce and none can digest—rages up and down the land. What Sam Blythe, that sterling eater, calls these alleged appetizers you couldn't print in a family newspaper, Sam's idea of a before-dinner nicknack being a baked him. A sturdy Texas congressman calls them doo-dabs.

But if I were living abroad again, I know what I'd call them. When you behold the array of this and that, as served at the beginning of luncheon in the average table d'hote restaurant over there, and especially in France, you are gazing upon what discriminating customers left on their plates at supper the night before.

• • •

Scrambled Cooking.

DOWN below Flagstaff, Ariz., but somewhat to the eastward, in a picturesque city which saddles the international boundary, I found a unique condition.

The best American food available is across the Mexican line at a restaurant owned by a Greek gentleman with a Chinese cook in the kitchen. But the best Mexican cookery is done well over on the American side by a German woman whose husband is an Italian.

So our own native-born citizens, when hungry for the typical dishes of New England or Dixie, journey beyond the border patrols, passing on their way many of their Spanish-speaking neighbors bound four miles northward for a bit of superior tamales and the more inflammatory brands of chili.

• • •

Dueling a la Europe

UNTIL Dr. Franz Sarga, the dueling husband of Budapest, really serves one of his enemies en brochette, as it were, instead of just trimming off hangnails and side whiskers, I decline to get worked up. You remember the Doc? He set out to carve everybody in Hungary who'd snooted his lady wife and found himself booked to take on quite a large club membership. But so far he hasn't done much more damage than a careless chiropodist could.

Once, in Paris, I was invited to a duel. I couldn't go, having a prior engagement to attend the World war, which was going on at that time, so I sent a substitute.

He reported that after the principals exchanged shots without peril, except to some sparrows passing overhead, all hands rushed together, entwining in a sort of true-love knot.

• • •

The Forgotten Man.

THOSE whose memories stretch that far back into political antiquity may recall the ancient days that seem so whimsically old-fashioned now, when our present President was running the first time on a platform which, by general consent, was laughed off immediately following election. He promised then to do something for the forgotten man. Remarks were also passed about balancing the budget right away. We needn't go into that.

But the forgotten man figured extensively in the campaign. Then, for awhile, popular interest in him seemed to languish. So many new issues came up suddenly, some, like dyspepsia symptoms, being but temporary annoyances, and some which lingered on and abide with us yet, including Mr. John L. Lewis, the well-known settee.

And now, after these five changeful, crowded years, we have solved the mystery—we know who the forgotten man is. The name is Tugwell, spelled as spoken, but you can pronounce it "Landon" and get practically the same general results.

AROUND the HOUSE

Items of Interest to the Housewife

Cooking Cauliflower—To prevent it breaking while cooking, wrap loosely in muslin.

• • •

Using Skim-Milk—Skim-milk is excellent for milk puddings, providing a dessertspoonful of finely-grated suet is added to replace the missing fat.

• • •

Making a Cushion—A useful flat cushion can be made from an old blanket. Fold it carefully to the size required, taking care that it is quite smooth and then secure the "layers" together with a few strong stitches. Slip it into a cover made from any pretty piece of material. These cushions are very useful when you want to make a chair higher, and are comfortable and firm to sit upon.

• • •

Bacon and Macaroni — Break two ounces of macaroni into small pieces and throw into quickly-boiling salted water. Simmer until tender. Fry two ounces of streaky bacon cut into small pieces, then drain the macaroni and add it to the bacon. Add seasoning, one-half ounce of butter, and a scrape of nutmeg, and stir over a low heat until the macaroni is brown. Turn on to a hot dish and serve with dry toast.

• • •

Maple Oatmeal Cookies—Two and a half cups fine oatmeal, one cup maple syrup, one quarter cup water, two and a half cups flour, one cup shortening, one teaspoon soda. Boil water and syrup together, add soda, then shortening. Cool slightly. Add to dry ingredients and allow the mixture to cool thoroughly before rolling out.

• • •

Economic Ironing—When ironing dispense with the ironing blanket and fold all the large things flat on the table, forming a "pad." On top of this I iron the small things, and when they are done, I find that the large things are quite nicely pressed.

• • •

Better Bread — Home-made bread is lighter and keeps moist longer when mixed with skim-milk instead of water.

Naming the Baby

RULES for euphony in naming the new baby:

If the surname has one syllable, avoid a one-syllable first name. Example: Montgomery Smith rather than John Smith.

With a two-syllable last name, use either a one-syllable or three-syllable Christian name. John Hinton or Christopher Hinton rather than Frederick Hinton.

When the last name has three syllables, use either a one or two-syllable name. George Dougherty, but not Alexander Dougherty. Avoid overlapping consonants such as James Stephens.—Literary Digest.

What SHE TOLD WORN-OUT HUSBAND

She could have reproached him for his fits of temper—his "all in" complaints. But wisely she saw in his frequent colds, his "fagged out," "on edge" condition the very trouble she herself had whipped. Constipation! The very morning after taking NR (Nature's Remedy), as she advised, he felt like himself again — keenly alert, peppy, cheerful. NR—the safe, dependable, all-vegetable laxative and corrective — works gently, thoroughly, naturally. It stimulates the eliminative tract to complete, regular functioning. Non-habit-forming. Try a box tonight. 25c —at druggists.

NR TO-NIGHT TOMORROW ALRIGHT

Stomach Gas So Bad Seems To Hurt Heart

"The gas on my stomach was so bad I could not eat or sleep. Even my heart seemed to hurt. A friend suggested Adlerika. The first dose I took brought me relief. Now I eat as I wish, sleep fine and never felt better." —Mrs. Jas. Filler.

Adlerika acts on BOTH upper and lower bowels while ordinary laxatives act on the lower bowel only. Adlerika gives your system a thorough cleansing, bringing out old, poisonous matter that you would not believe was in your system and that has been causing gas pains, sour stomach, nervousness and headaches for months.

Dr. H. L. Shoub, New York, reports: "In addition to intestinal cleansing, Adlerika greatly reduces bacteria and colon bacilli."

Give your bowels a REAL cleansing with Adlerika and see how good you feel. Just one spoonful relieves GAS and stubborn constipation. At all Leading Druggists.

FLOYD GIBBONS' ADVENTURERS' CLUB

FAMOUS HEADLINE HUNTER

Hello Everybody

"Cherchez La Femme"

By FLOYD GIBBONS

THROW another log on the fire, Uncle Mike, call all the neighborhood adventurers in, light the old pipe, settle back and I'll tell you the story of the doggondest adventure I've heard in many a moon.

A bunch of the boys were whooping it up in the Malamute saloon when out of the darkness and into the light there stepped—a blond.

Oh! Oh! I'm getting ahead of myself. Allan J. McDonald now lives in Chicago. But a couple of years ago he was a reporter for a paper in El Paso, Tex. That's right across the Rio Grande from Juarez, Mexico.

Well, sir, it was Al's night off and he and a bunch of the boys went across the Rio Grande to Juarez. They went into a couple of bars, had a few drinks and along about midnight decided it was time to start back to El Paso.

Out Ran the Blond Girl.

As they stepped out of a bar onto the dimly lit street a tall blond American girl went running past them. Close at her heels and cursing in Spanish was a swarthy Mexican. The girl was screaming and it didn't take Al and his friends long to realize that the girl was in trouble.

With a yell they were off in hot pursuit.

Up unpaved alleys they dashed, slid around dusty corners onto dark streets, shouted and yelled. No one paid any attention to them nor did anybody else join the chase. Suddenly they came to the banks of the Rio Grande and then the girl and the Mexican disappeared into thin air.

Al and his pals looked around a bit but couldn't find a trace of the girl or the Mexican. So the boys started back toward the center of the town. They hadn't gone half a block when from behind them came fifteen Mexicans on the run waving all kinds of weapons in the air and shouting at the top of their lungs.

Al tells me that in the glance he gave over his shoulder before he started to beat it he saw, lead pipes, old boards, knives and razors strapped to hammer handles.

Great Battle in the River.

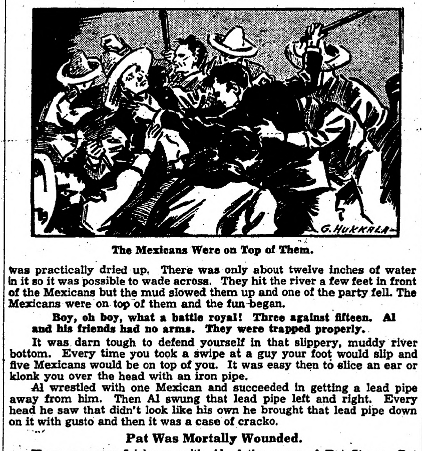
Well, sir, Al and his two buddies started. They started right for the Rio Grande and the good old U. S. A. The river at that time of the year was practically dried up. There was only about twelve inches of water in it so it was possible to wade across. They hit the river a few feet in front of the Mexicans but the mud slowed them up and one of the party fell. The Mexicans were on top of them and the fun began.



The Mexicans Were on Top of Them.

Boy, oh boy, what a battle royal! Three against fifteen. Al and his friends had no arms. They were trapped properly.

It was darn tough to defend yourself in that slippery, muddy river bottom. Every time you took a swipe at a guy your foot would slip and five Mexicans would be on top of you. It was easy then to slice an ear or klonk you over the head with an iron pipe.

Al wrestled with one Mexican and succeeded in getting a lead pipe away from him. Then Al swung that lead pipe left and right. Every head he saw that didn't look like his own he brought that lead pipe down on it with gusto and then it was a case of cracko.

Pat Was Mortally Wounded.

There was one Irishman with Al of the name of Pat Stacy. Pat knocked three of them thar gents down before somebody shoved an old-fashioned hat pin clean through him. Pat died three weeks later from lobar pneumonia.

The other friend of Al was knocked out early in the fight and fell into the water. Why he didn't drown Al doesn't know.

For twenty minutes they fought in the Rio Grande that night before help came. But to Al, those twenty minutes felt more like twenty years. The border patrol finally heard the commotion and broke up the affair. Al was minus part of an ear, his head and chin were slashed up and both his lapels were cut completely off.

The fellow that was knocked out and fell in the river didn't have a scratch on him. Was he lucky? And were you lucky, Al? Believe me, I've been in Juarez and I know they used to get pretty rough over there.

All right, Uncle Mike, I'll tell you about the blond. She was the come-on for the Mexicans. They pulled the same stunt often and it is said that it was a profitable business, although Al never could figure out how it could be so good when the take had to be split fifteen ways.

Judge Extols Dog From Bench in Damage Suit

In rendering an opinion in a damage suit in which a man lost his life trying to rescue a drowning dog, a Georgia supreme justice devoted a half hour to extolling the virtues of dogs and two or three sentences to his decision, states a writer in the Chicago Tribune. Part of the justice's remarks were as follows:

"From the dawn of primal history the dog has loomed large in the art and literature of the world. In metal and in stone his noble image has been perpetuated, but the dog's chief monument is in the heart of his friend, man. As a house pet, a watchdog, a herder of sheep and cattle, in the field of sport, and as the motive power of transportation, especially in the ice fields of the far north, the dog has ever been a faithful companion and helper of man. In the trackless forests of the new world he was on the firing line of civilization in the task of subduing all enemies, whether savage man or wild beast.

"Literature is enriched by the story of Ulysses' dog, Argos. After twenty years of war and wandering this king of Ithaca returned, unrecognized in his beggar rags, but as he entered the courtyard his hound raised up his head and pricked his ears.

"Among many of the most beautiful of nature's plants and trees we have the dogwood, dog daisy, dog laurel, dog rose, dog violet, and the like.

"Baron Cuvier considered the dog 'the most complete, the most singular, and the most useful conquest man has gained in the animal world.'

"Alexander H. Stephens wrote for his sagacious poodle, Rio: 'Here rest the remains of what in life was a satire on the human race and an honor to his own—a faithful dog.'

"Tributes might be multiplied almost without number. Like man, not all dogs are good dogs. They have left behind them records showing every degree of good and bad."

Written in Latin, the universal language of the educated of Europe, the book sold 24,000 copies.

MELVIN PURVIS FORMER ACE G-MAN invites all boys and girls to join NEW CORPS OF SECRET OPERATORS

MELVIN PURVIS, former Ace G-Man who founded the Junior G-Man Corps, has formed a new organization called Melvin Purvis' Law-and-Order Patrol. Members are Secret Operators. They have special codes, passwords, and special equipment. Here is one adventure, published as proof that CRIME DOES NOT PAY. As the story opens, Melvin Purvis has invited two of his Secret Operators to have Sunday night supper at his headquarters . . .

Suddenly, out of the bitter cold winter night comes a frantic phone call . . .

Midnight that night. The servants have retired, the chauffeur is in his room over the garage, the house is quiet . . .

HOW MELVIN PURVIS KNEW THAT IT WAS AN "INSIDE JOB"
I knew that all the windows should have been frozen tight, due to the snow and ice packed on the sills outside. I also knew that, if one window opened easily, it was likely that salt had been used to prevent freezing and enable the window to be opened silently even in the bitter cold hours of the night . . . therefore, whoever had left fingerprints on a salt shaker was probably the "inside man"!

COME ON, BOYS AND GIRLS! BE A SECRET OPERATOR IN MY NEW LAW-AND-ORDER PATROL! GET MY NEW SECRET OPERATOR'S SHIELD AND MY SECRET OPERATOR'S MANUAL CONTAINING SPECIAL CODES AND INSTRUCTIONS . . . ## History Of Chucrh Congregation

The following history of the Golden Valley Church was obtained from Mrs. Olaf Dahl and Rev. T. C. L. Hanson. S. D. Lincoln of Stephen, under the auspices of the Minnesota Historical Society began the investsgation last fall.

The members of the Golden Valley Lutheran Congregation live in Mud Lake township and vicinity, Marshall County, Minn. They are affiliated with the Norwegian Lutheran Church of America. Prior to 1917 this congregation belonged to the Norwegian Synod.

The congregation was organized in 1910 with the following membership: Mrs. Emma Dahl, Mr. and Mrs. E. C. Johnson, Mrs. G. Tveit, Mr. and Mrs. Olaf Dahl, Mrs. Elmer Odie, Mrs. Knute Nelson.

The congregation has always been served by the same pastors as the church at Holt, and services have been held at the various homes or at a schoolhouse.

The congregation had planned to build a church on the two acres of land on the S E ¼ of Sec 16, Mud Lake township that were donated by Mrs. Lena Odie as a building site and for a cemetery. The cemetery was established and dedicated Sept. 28, 1923 by Rev. M. B. Ordahl but the church was never built. The congregation had a building fund of $500.00 deposited with the Holt State Bank. This money was lost when the bank closed in 1922. Since that time the Ladies' Aid Society has managed to save another $500.00 toward a church building. But owing to the fact that farms in the locality are being taken over by the government for the purpose of establishing a wild game refuge, residents of the community will be compelled to find homes elsewhere and, like the Acadians, the membership of the church will probably be scattered. These brave pioneers who have worked together for so many years and who have looked forward so eagerly to the time when they should have their own house of worship are once more disappointed and now find that their goal cannot be attained.

The little cemetery will have to be vacated and the final resting place of loved ones buried there may be in some spot far removed from the new, and as yet unknown, homes of surviving relatives and friends.

The first trustees of the congregation were E. C. Johnson, Christ Norbeck and George Olson

The present trustees are: Olaf Dahl, Ole Tveit and E. C. Johnson. The following pastors have served the congregation: Rev. M B. Ordahl, 1910—26. Rev. L. M. Redal, 1927—35. Rev. T. C. L. Hanson, 1936—date.

Services have been conducted in both English and Scandinavian.

The Golden Valley Ladies' Aid Society was organized about 1910 and now has a membership of eight. Their chief objective has been to raise funds for building a church. The present officers are: Miss Ruby Johnson, Miss Gladys Dahl. Mrs. E. C. Johnson and Mrs. Olaf Dahl.

The membership of the church at the time of organization was twenty, and is still twenty and comprises six families.

The achievements of this small congregation demonstrates what may be done by a few people, all working together to accomplish a definite purpose, and should serve as an example and an inspiration to other communities.

Message To The Legislature

Governor Benson's message to the Legislature in which he asked passage of a law exempting farms and city homesteads from the state realty levy for the first $4,000 valuation and a tax program to permit the state to fix a levy on real property of 8 mills or less for each year of the next biennium, struck popular approval on the part of the rank and file of the people. 'Only those who are more concerned with the special interest groups than they are with the general welfare of the people are opposed to the Governor's program.

The conservative Senate is the stumbling block to legislation exempting city homesteads and farms, as the liberal House already passed this measure at the regular session. Anticipating that the Governor would ask that the special session pass a homestead exemption law, the Senate at its first meeting, before awaiting the Governor's address passed a rule which would limit consideration of legislation only to "reveue producing measures"

Liberal members of the Senate have attempted to modify this gag rule, but at this writing the attempt had met with failure. It remains to be seen whether the folks back home - - those most concerned with a measure of this kind - - will be able to exert sufficient pressure upon their conservative senators to induce them to change their position and actually do something by way of substantial tax relief to those who own their homes and their farms.

The Governor also recommended consideration of other important legislation which the regular session failed to pass. He pointed out that both the Senate and the House will have much spare time while their tax conference groups are meeting to consider such legislation as: youth measures: increase of personal property exemptions of farmers from $300 to $500; passage of the oleomargarine bill, and labor legislation. In considering this legislation, he stated that the session should not be prolonged beyond the time needed to enact the tax program and pass the necessary appropriation bills for which the session was called.

Hello Everybody!

"Tide of Death"

By FLOYD GIBBONS
Famous Headline Hunter

WHEN Hubert C. Fuller of Brooklyn was eighteen, his dad moved from Missouri to a spot in Oklahoma on the banks of the Canadian river. The nearest town was Konawa, but in the section the Fullers moved to, they and the R. F. D. postmaster were the only settlers within a radius of about fifteen miles. The Fullers' farm was on one side of the river and the postmaster's was on the other.

Hube says the river bed was three quarters of a mile wide, but in the summer of 1913, when they moved there, hot weather and a drouth had just about dried the river up. There was nothing but a little stream of water about six feet wide and three feet deep, running zig-zag from one bank to the other.

There was treachery in that sluggish river, too. Its headwaters were up in the Colorado mountains, and sometimes water from melting snow would sweep down the dry river bed in a torrential avalanche, taking everything before it and filling the river bed from bank to bank. "The natives," says Hube, "call these frequent occurrences 'head rises.'"

Couldn't Understand His Alarm.

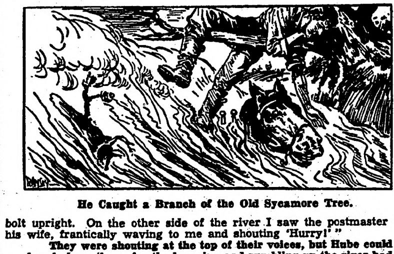
And though Hube knows all about those "head rises" now, he didn't know a thing about them at the time this story opens.

Hube's dad had gone across the river a few days before to help the postmaster cut some wood on his farm, and he had asked Hube to hitch up the team to the wagon and drive over and get a load. It was a hot day, with thunder clouds up the river to the northwest. Hube drove the horses—Sis and Ned—down into the river bed. He forded what little water there was in the bottom and then let the horses pick their way while he lay down in the wagon with his hat over his eyes.

Several times, he thought he heard strange rumblings up river, but he paid no attention to them. "I must have dozed off to sleep," he says, "for the next thing I knew I heard someone shout my name. I sat bolt upright. On the other side of the river I saw the postmaster and his wife, frantically waving to me and shouting 'Hurry!'"



He Caught a Branch of the Old Sycamore Tree.

They were shouting at the top of their voices, but Hube could barely hear them, for the booming and rumbling up the river had suddenly increased to a roar. "I was just about in the middle of the river bed," he says, "going cat-a-corner downstream to where an old sycamore marked the wagon road. I gave the horses the line and they started to trot. I was puzzled. What was wrong with the postmaster?"

Thirty-Foot Wall of Water.

But as Hube watched the postmaster he pointed upstream. Hube looked. "I could see the bed for about a mile, up to where it made a sharp turn," he says. "There was nothing but wind-swept sand. But as I looked, cold terror struck to the marrow of my bones. Around the bend, like a black nightmare, whirled a thirty-foot wall of water. As it turned the bend, the sandy banks on either side caved in with a great splash."

Hube was panic-stricken. He jumped between the horses, unhooked the traces, and riding Ned and leading Sis, he started to ride for his life. Sis wasn't used to being led by the halter and she held back. "I hated to do it," says Hube, "but I let her go. The river bank ahead was too steep for the horse. I had to run him downstream toward the wagon trail. It was a terrible race!"

The roar of the water was fairly deafening now. Hube's horse sensed the danger and ran like mad. Hube says he didn't dare look back, but he could hear that water getting closer and closer as they raced on. He was almost to the bank fifteen feet—ten feet away—when he felt spray on his cheek. And then another fear seized him.

Safe in the Sycamore Tree.

"Ned was doing his best," he says, "but after all, he was just a big, heavy plow horse. The path up the bank was steep, and he could never make the grade at the speed he was going. We were at the foot of the incline when Ned hit the rise with his knees, stumbled and went down. Then, with a last heroic effort, he lurched straight up on his haunches."

And that lurch saved Hube's life. As the horse rose in the air, Hube grabbed wildly for support, and as luck would have it he caught a branch of the old sycamore tree hanging over the bank. Says he: "I scurried like a possum for the highest branch—just in the nick of time. The avalanche was on us. Old Ned bellowed a high, shrill scream. Then he was crushed under the terrific force of the water. I never saw him, Sis or the wagon again. The postmaster and his wife had turned their backs on the awful scene. When I shouted, they stared at me as if they were seeing a ghost. The muddy water was churning and boiling about my feet. The old sycamore tree was all but covered with it."

The postmaster got a rope and threw it to Hube. "I walked hand over hand, up to my waist in water," he says, "until I reached solid ground. I had no more reached safety than I heard a splash. The old sycamore tree had toppled into the muddy water."

Hube says that since that day he has lived an uneventful life. "But man," says he, "I'm satisfied."

Display of the Flag

The flag should be displayed only from sunrise to sunset; it should be displayed on national and state holidays and on historic and special occasions; it should be hoisted briskly and lowered slowly and ceremoniously. In raising and lowering the flag it should never be allowed to touch the ground. When the flags of states or cities or pennants of societies are flown on the same halyard with the flag of the United States, the American flag is always at the peak. When flown from adjacent staffs one flag of the United States should be hoisted first. No flag or pennant should be placed above or to the right of the flag of the United States, except where a number of flags are grouped or displayed from staffs, when the flag of the United States should be in the center.

Longest and Shortest Days

The longest and shortest days of the year are determined by the summer and winter solstices, the exact time being determined by mathematical calculation. The solstices are the times of the year when the sun is at its greatest declination, either north or south. For instance, the summer solstice is the time when the sun reaches its farthest point in its swing northward from the equator, which, accordingly, marks the longest day of the year. The year consists of approximately 365¼ days, and it is this fractional day of each year which causes the solstices to fluctuate. This is adjusted by the leap years. However, the longest and shortest days differ in length from the days immediately preceding and following them by only a fraction of a minute.

To Keep Frosting From Running—A half teaspoonful of baking soda added to boiling frosting will keep it from running.

Season Lightly — Be careful when doubling a recipe not to double the seasoning. Use it sparingly at first, then add more if needed.

• • •

Keeps Cauliflower White—A tablespoon of sugar in the water in which cauliflower is cooked will keep it white.

• • •

Eliminating Food Odors — A small quantity of charcoal in a container on the top shelf will help eliminate food odors from the refrigerator.

• • •

Hole in Tablecloth—If a small hole is burnt or worn in an otherwise good white tablecloth, it can be "mended" most effectively by stitching a motif in fine crochet over it and cutting away the spoiled fabric underneath. Add one or two more motifs so that the necessary one does not look odd. This is certainly more decorative than an obvious darn!

Glazing Liquid for Cookies—A mixture of two tablespoons of sugar and one-fourth cup of milk makes a good glazing liquid for cookies. Apply on the surface of the dough with a pastry brush before baking the cookies.

Poor Lo's Revival.

SANTA MONICA, CALIF.—Despite the blessings of civilization which we have bestowed upon them, including diseases, whisky, soda pop, and $2 overalls, the American Indians are increasing.

This should give our red brothers cause for worry. Suppose they got so numerous that we gave this country back to them?

Already we are indebted to these original inhabitants for quinine, cocaine, cotton, chocolate, tobacco, corn, beans, squashes pumpkins, grapefruit, huckleberries and hundreds of other remedial drugs or foodstuffs. Moreover, an eminent authority says the curative methods of the old medicine man had values which in many respects excelled what the white man has produced and suggests our scientists might well adopt certain aspects of the aborigine's plan.

What if we did that very thing and then, by the way of exchange, invited the tribesmen to take over such trifling problems as an unbalanced budget, our European debts, sitdown strikes and the younger generation?

• • •

Cleaning up the Stage.

HAVING lost their licenses, fourteen burlesque houses in New York won't ever get them back if the officials keep their word about it.

With this example to go by, authorities might next try the idea of cleaning up the legitimate stage there — the spawning-place and breeding ground of shows which filthy lines and filthier scenes are freely offered to pop-eyed audiences recruited from what we call our best families. Poisoning the moral atmosphere of the theater appears to be the favorite sport of a new school of dramatists who, when they were little boys, had their mouths washed out with soap for using dirty words, yet never got over the habit.

• • •

The Fate of Beauty Queens.

JUST as the weather gets warm so the contestants won't catch anything worse than sunburn, that outbreak of annual monotony known as the beauty contest will stir the populace to heights of the utmost indifference. There will be no dress rehearsals beforehand. With beauty contests, it's the other way around.

And then when Miss Cherokee Stripp or Miss Clear View has been hailed as America's prize package of loveliness, she will, if she runs true to form, put her clothes back on and catch the next train for California with the intention of starring in the movies.

On arrival, she will be pained to note that none of the studio heads is waiting at the station to sign her up; also that practically all the starring jobs are being held by young ladies who, in addition to good looks, have that desirable little thing called personality. And next fall she'll be dealing 'em off the arm in a Hollywood hashery.

• • •

International Slickers.

RUMORS persist that the United States, Great Britain and France are preparing for eventual agreements on monetary stabilization, tariff and trade adjustments, price-fixing of essential commodities—and, believe it or not, brethren and sistren—a settlement of the defaulted foreign debts owed to us.

Maybe it's significant—or, if you want to be broadminded and charitable about it, merely a coincidence—that every dispatch from European sources on this matter lists the debts last. And, verily I say unto you, that's exactly when and where they will come—last.

I seem to see the big three gathered at the council table for the final session and La Belle France moving that, everything else having been arranged to the satisfaction of the majority present and the hour being late, the detail of those debts be put over to some future date. John Bull seconds the motion. Motion carried by a vote of 2 to 1, Uncle Sam being feebly recorded in the negative.

A Sense of Humor.

DAMON RUNYON, who, being wise, should know better, reopens the issue of whether many people have a sense of humor. This provokes somebody to inquire what is humor, anyhow?

I stand by this definition: Humor is tragedy standing on its head with its pants torn.

Lots of folks think a sense of humor is predicated on the ability to laugh at other folks, which is wrong. A real sense of humor is based on our ability to laugh at ourselves. You have to say, not as Puck did, "What fools these mortals be," but, "What fools we mortals be."

That's why few women have a true sense of humor. Usually a woman, even a witty woman, takes herself so seriously, she can never regard herself unseriously.

—11—

In the small square house where the dynamo stood greasy and unresponsive, Bryn detached a pair of overalls from a peg on the wall and climbed into them. "Now," he said, when Gary had given him the pathological history of the electric plant, "if you'll go and prepare a large and delectable dinner, and leave me alone in my glory, I'll see what's to be done, Gary."

There was, as Bryn had suspected, nothing seriously wrong with the engine of the electric plant. He opened the cocks to drain out all the old oil, cleaned the connections, and made a note of the few parts it would be necessary to replace. Before the motor was started, he decided, it would be wise to inspect the connections at the house. He removed the greasy overalls, hung them on the peg.

He went to the kitchen and got a drink. Gary was shelling peas. All morning, as Bryn knew, he and Deborah had spent making strawberry jam; and now every window-sill was filled with small ruby jars which caught and held the sunlight.

"Where's there a ladder?" he asked.

"Out on the edge of the orchard," Gary told him. "But you better be careful of it. It isn't as good as it might be."

Bryn went out behind the house and followed with his eye the line of the electric wires as they crossed the trees and the brook. He went out to the orchard, lifted the ladder lying half-hidden in the grass, carried it back and propped it up against the wall of the house, beneath the place where the wires entered. Trying each rung cautiously, he went up the ladder.

As he reached the top he turned half-around as he took the pliers from his pocket, and was just in time to see Deborah emerge from her retreat down near the bridge. He did not look at her, but went busily to work, whistling blithely, attacking the wires at their point of connection with the house.

There was a sudden ominous cracking which Bryn scarcely heard; he was listening for Deborah's footstep on the path beside him, wondering whether to look down and smile or to continue absorbedly with his work. He was spared the necessity of making a choice; for, a moment after the unheeded warning, the rung upon which he was standing collapsed into splinters, and Bryn fell neatly through. He heard Deborah scream; the puppy barked furiously; and then he dropped into oblivion.

He awoke, a few moments later, with something cold dashing across his forehead, and the sound of Deborah's voice saying in a whisper, "More, Gary, get more, quick!" The sound of footsteps. Bryn lay motionless, collecting himself. He was not hurt. He knew he was not hurt. The grass was thick, here, and he had broken his fall; his head had probably been whacked just hard enough to put him out for a minute or two. He did not open his eyes. Deborah was beside him. She put her hand on his forehead, lifted the wet hair back from his brow.

She bent over him. "Don't die," she whispered like a breath. "Don't die, please don't die."

He moved his head faintly, and lifted his hand. He would find hers . . . with his wedding ring on it . . . he would hold it firmly, and tell her . . . her little white hand . . . he groped for it.

Something soft and light fell on his cheek, a delicate gentle touch. He caught his breath and held it. The touch came again, gentle, on his cheek, at the side of his mouth. He threw off his pretense of weakness, put his hand up quickly, opened his eyes, his heart thumping; and found himself clutching with both hands the puppy, nosing him in an anxiety of curiosity. Deborah was gone.

He got up with the puppy under his arm and strolled grimly around the corner, to meet Gary, wild-eyed, approaching with a brimming dipper of water.

"You aren't hurt, sir?" Gary gasped breathlessly. "Aren't you hurt?"

"Not a scratch," Bryn replied. "Sorry to frighten you."

"Well, that is good," Gary said with heartfelt emotion. "I got a terrible fright. And Miss Deborah was coming to the house and saw you fall. She . . ." he stopped.

"She what?" Bryn asked calmly.

"She's crying."

Evening came on again; dinner was served in the dining room, brighter now with a host of tall tapers. Grandmother was happy tonight, gay and light hearted. When dinner was over she wanted to go for a little stroll.

It was a glorious night. The moon had already risen, and hung, a huge silver lamp, just over the top of the lowest hill. The sky was deep blue. Grandmother leaned on Bryn's arm; Deborah was on her other side.

They came back to the front porch at last, but Grandmother did not stop. She did not seem to notice their awkward silences. She walked to the corner of the house, and there, gently, she withdrew from between them and tucked Deborah's arm in Bryn's.

"There, my darlings," she said, with the ghost of a laugh. "Walk together down the path beside the brook. It's a perfect night for lovers. I am going in now. Good night!" and before Deborah's hand could stop her, or Bryn's words could form themselves, she was gone.

"Very nice night," Bryn said formally.

"Yes," Deborah agreed after a moment.

She glanced up at him in the moonlight, but his face was cool and unmoved. Wordless, she followed his lead, walking quietly beside him. They went slowly down along the brook.

They were almost at the end of the path. He had not spoken. She lifted her head. "I'm . . . I'm sorry you fell and hurt yourself," she said in that delicious low voice with the tiny break.

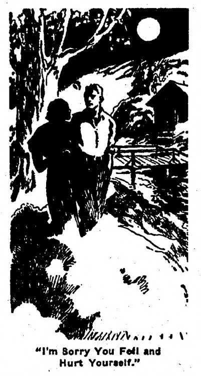
"I didn't hurt myself," Bryn said calmly. "Sorry to cause a commotion."

They reached the end of the path. Bryn turned. Deborah hesitated, but, after a second, turned beside him. Half-way to the house she hesitated. "It was . . . kind of you to remember tobacco for Gary," she said. "I didn't realize why he wasn't smoking."

Bryn did not reply.

Almost back at the house, she spoke again. Her voice held a hint of desperation. "It . . . it is a lovely night, isn't it?" she said.

"I think it's a little chilly," Bryn replied. "Do you suppose your grandmother thinks we've been out long enough now?"



"I'm Sorry You Fell and Hurt Yourself."

She stopped and looked up at him. And as he looked down at her, she turned away with a little droop in her shoulders, and left him.

• • • • • • • •

Deborah stood against the stone railing of the balcony, surveying the changes taking place in her little world, and was thoroughly miserable. Everyone seemed to be in a conspiracy against her. Grandmother was very happy; her cheeks grew pinker every day, her appetite had improved. Grandmother, of course, thought that Deborah was happy too. She didn't begin to realize how empty life was now, and how lost and forlorn Deborah was beginning to feel. It hadn't occurred to her that this dream of hers which had come true had never been Deborah's dream.

Yes, Bryn was making Grandmother happy; but that was frightening. Because, at the end of the year . . .

And one couldn't dream of making a bargain with him to continue the play acting until . . . until Grandmother didn't need anyone any longer. That would be years and years, Deborah hoped. And he had his own life to live, his own career to carve out, his own . . . well, his own girl to marry.

Deborah fell to wondering what his own girl was like. She would be beautiful, of course, and probably tall and queenly, instead of little and childish. It was difficult to understand what her circumstances were that she would allow him to make money for her in such a strange way. If she were wealthy, surely they would have been married whether he had money or not. If she were poor, one would think that she would have been willing to marry him and share his difficult times with him. There must be something about her that Deborah didn't understand.

Deborah moved suddenly from the balcony railing and went inside her own pretty bedroom; and there she flung herself on the bed and cried miserably into the silver and violet spread.

After a long time she sat up and dried her eyes. There wasn't anything to cry about. What if they had laughed at her? She would never see the girl, and the girl would never see her. As for the man, they were as distant from each other as any two people could possibly be, who had to act at intervals an affectionate little comedy. The other night she had tried, it was true, to be friendly. She had tried to apologize for not accepting his assistance with better grace, to tell him how sorry she was that he had been hurt while trying to help her; and he hadn't allowed her to be friendly. He had been cold and unresponsive, and she hated him for it. But it was better for him to be so. Far better. There wasn't anything between them but the relation of an employer to a servant; he had said so himself.

She got down from the bed and tiptoed to the door. No one was about, she knew that. The maids had been here for two days, and the cook as well, but they were all down in the living room with Gary, putting it in order.

Deborah went through the back door and down the path to her old playhouse.

Dressed for the Occasion

"HI THERE, Mrs. Astorbilt, where are you going in that lovely summer gown?"

"Not very far, Miss Junior Deb, just down to the store to buy material for a play suit like yours."

"Well, Ma-mah, if you must copy my style, you couldn't find a better model because these shorts really fit, and the whole thing is a tailored job."

A Stylist peaks.

"May I as Susie Sew-Your-Own interrupt you two with the latest word from my class in dress design? You, Sis, are a pre-vue of Miss America in proper sports wear while Ma-mah is modern to the minute with her raised waistline and fulled bodice. I, in this morning frock, have what the book calls classic simplicity. Be that as it may, I couldn't get along without it, because it's so cool and comfortable."

Everybody's Happy.

"Thanks for the approval, Susie. Your clever dress would be a bright spot in anybody's kitchen, and now that you've got the swing of this sewing business there will be no stopping you. But even so, I must admit I'm a proud mother. You can go just as far as you like with this new hobby."

"Gee, Ma-mah, isn't it swell to be on such friendly terms with Fashion? I think good old Sew-Your-Own deserves most of the credit for arranging the introduction. Spring means so much more when one's clothes look the part."

"You're quite right, dear, but now let's run along. We have work to do."

McLean System Will Save Swine Losses

—Prepared by American Foundation for Animal Health

Millions of dollars in swine losses could be prevented every year if farmers would universally adopt the "McLean County," or clean-ground system of rotating hog lots.

A hog lot which has been used for a period of years, is infested with literally billions of germs of swine diseases, and millions of eggs of swine parasites—ready and waiting for the next crop of pigs to be born.

Under the McLean County plan, the young pigs escape these dangers through the simple measure of moving both the sows and their young onto clean, fresh pasture land, about two or three weeks after the pigs are born. Here they grow to maturity without ever coming into contact with the infections of the old lot. And every year, the hog pasture is rotated just as corn land is now rotated.

A few posts, poles, and a load of straw are all the material needed to make a suitable shed for the temporary pasture. Then, when the shed is no longer needed, the posts and poles can be removed, and the straw burned.

If, along with the "clean ground" plan, farmers would universally adopt the practice of having their pigs vaccinated against cholera two or three weeks after weaning time, the annual saving in unnecessary death losses would amount to many million dollars. In spite of every precaution, cholera breaks out year after year, often where least expected. It is the most costly livestock disease in America, and the farmer who does not have his veterinarian immunize his swine, simply as a matter of common-sense insurance, is as foolish as the farmer who fails to take out fire insurance on his house and buildings.

High School

The Biology students are having quite a time with their tests. When Florence gave her test, it was corrected in class. She read the answers several times and then asked if they had all gotten them. "No" Robert brilliantly spoke up, "I got five wrong."

When Harold gave his test on early man, one of the statements was that man had to remain in one place because he didn't know any methods of transportation. Alfred contradicted this statement, saying that man could move around. Harold retorted. "Well yes, you don't suppose he'd stand in one place all his life, do you?" That's Harold for you! He'll do it every time.

Marian is starting a collection perhaps she'll tell you what of. Rather a nice hobby, we think. Or do we?

Tell me not in mournful number, school is but an easy dream. Where did we hear it? The Juniors remember their poetry and have recently formed a parody to Longfellows work. Are they having a grand time with their speeches for graduation. Poor Juniors! They didn't even get a chance to strike on Friday because — oh they were excused —yes!

The verdant Frosh are back on the tutoring list again. A certain Soph and Junior certainly like it?

Only a short time left 'till the fatal days. Ho, hum! Here,s wishing everybody luck. And a pleasant summer vacation.

The English 3 class wrote poems last Friday. The class thought this one very appropriate to print.

Our Class Play.

"Smile A While" is the name of our play
That, after five weeks, we presented Thursday.
Bess, a young steno, impulsive and flirtatious;
Fred is a taxi driver, who tries to be ambitious;
David Brown, a negro, has white kinky hair;
While Mr. Zink, the villian, tries hard to be unfair.
Miss Leckie is a business woman age twenty-five,
Who comes and sells advertisements that makes business thrive
Now Blow who is a broker, is unscrupulous and sleek;
He tries to win Bess Holly, but his intentions prove weak.
Marion Pratt, who is a widow, owns the paint company.
And Edith Zink is a high hat, to this we all agree.
Now, as the plot does thicken, Fred's heart for her does yearn.
Then, quite unexpectedly, we discover her return.
Mr. Ward, a customer, sends cash to pay a bill,
And now the lovers are living in their house upon the hill.

CHAPTER VI

—12—

Deborah walked slowly back to the house. The shadows were beginning to lengthen; the sun was already dropping down toward the western hills. In the garden the men had turned on the spray of the new watering system that had been installed, and the water spread up in a wide jewelled fan against the orchard green.

From the road outside the wall came the steady hum of an approaching motor. The motor slowed. The gate was open; the car turned in and came cautiously up the drive not with its usual swift rush to the house.

It was Mr. Forbes.

"Here I am," he said cheerfully. "Don't say you don't remember me!"

"Of course I remember you," Deborah said, smiling. "It's only a little more than two weeks."

He took her outstretched hand. He smiled down at her, the warmest and most comfortable kind of smile. "Where's Bryn?" His eyes searched her face, and she flushed faintly as she answered.

"He's gone to town. You must have passed him there."

"Well, he'll come back," Tubby said with assurance, and turned to the man who had come with him, still sitting in the car. "It's the place, all right," he said, and the man began to climb out. Tubby turned back to Deborah. "I've brought the new butler."

"Oh." Deborah's eyes flickered over the grave and dignified mien of the new butler. She nodded to him. "I'll call Gary," she decided, turned, stepped inside the kitchen and called out "Gary! Oh, Gar-eee!"

In a moment he came, puffing, red faced, his coat only half on. He was fumbling for the sleeve. "Never mind your coat," Deborah told him, and took it away from him. "This is Gary, Mr. Forbes," she told Tubby. "Mr. Forbes is . . . is Bryn's best friend," she informed Gary. "He has brought us a butler. You will take care of him, Gary, and Mr. Forbes, too, I must run and tell Grandmother." She smiled again at Tubby. "She will be wondering."

"Who was that, dear?" Grandmother inquired as Deborah reached the foot of the steps. "Not gardeners, surely. They seem quite different."

"It's . . . a Mr. Forbes, Grandmother. I told you about him. He was at my wedding. Bryn calls him Tubby. Because he is so pink and plump, I suppose. And the man with him is the new butler. Gary is taking care of them."

Grandmother sighed contentedly. "I can scarcely believe it," she murmured.

Footsteps sounded in the hall inside the open door, and Tubby appeared in the doorway. He hesitated, and Deborah went to his side.

"Grandmother, this is Mr. Forbes," she murmured, and Tubby crossed the porch to bend over the wrinkled hand held out to him. He looked very nice indeed in a suit of gray-blue, a perfectly tailored suit.

"I am so glad you have come," Grandmother was saying. She settled herself again into her pillows and drew the thin Paisley smooth over her knees. "I have suggested to Bryn any number of times that we might have some of his friends come and visit us, but as yet we have been so busy putting the house and ourselves in order."

Tubby was frankly staring at her. "Do you call him Bryn, now?" he inquired.

"Yes. He explained it to me, and asked me if I minded. Of course I did not mind. I have become very fond of him, even in this short time. It doesn't matter what he is called. You have known him a long time, Mr. Forbes?"

"Yes," Tubby was beginning, comfortably. He settled down in his chair.

A stately figure appeared in the doorway. It was the butler, bland and serene, with a small silver tray holding a bell. He looked at Tubby and waited.

"Oh," Tubby said. "Mrs. Larned, this is Burch. I think he will be able to make you comfortable."

"How do you do, Burch," Grandmother said gently. Burch bowed, and murmured an acknowledgment of the introduction. He advanced slowly and put the bell down on the small table at Grandmother's side. His movements were quietly majestic. He began to withdraw.

"Hi," Tubby called after him. "Bring me my bag, will you, Burch?"

"Yes, sir."

In a few moments he returned with a heavy pigskin bag which he set down before Tubby on the porch. He went away again. Tubby fumbled in his pocket for a key ring. He opened the bag. He looked at Deborah.

"I've brought you some wedding presents," he said with his fascinating lisp. "There wasn't time to tell anyone before you left San Francisco. Bryn made me promise I wouldn't tell, anyway, as if it could have been kept quiet. The city is buzzing."

"Oh, dear," Deborah said faintly.

Nobody heard her. Grandmother was looking very proud. "His is a very old family, of course," she said. "Even in San Francisco the wedding was certain to be a matter of comment. Nobody there will remember us, but I am pleased to think that Bryn is well known."

Tubby drew forth a tissue-wrapped box. "This is from my sister Sally," he explained, handing it to Deborah.

Deborah unwrapped the tissue paper. Inside was a long velvet jeweler's box; she opened it, and there, in the white velvet lining, lay a whole suite of rose-colored crystals, exquisitely cut. The long strand of the necklace dropped to her waist; the earrings were pendant on silver chains; there were two sparkling bracelets and a beautiful ring. Deborah looked at them.

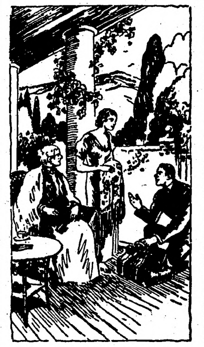
"Is your sister Sally . . . is she a very great friend of Bryn's too?"

"Yes, indeed. They've adored each other for years. When Sally and Simon used to quarrel, it was always Bryn that Sally went to for sympathy. He'd let her cry it out on his shoulder, and pat her—you know, the way men do," Tubby said to Grandmother with camaraderie . . . "and then he would slip off and telephone Simon, give him a good wigging, and tell him where Sally was. . . . I don't think they'd ever have got through at all if it hadn't been for Bryn."

"Who is Simon?" Deborah heard herself saying.

"Simon? Oh, he's Sally's husband. They're crazy about each other, you know, and always were, but they did quarrel until they were married. Now, here," Tubby went on, rummaging with one hand and holding out a flat round parcel with the other. "This is from me. It's the only way you'd ever get it. I thought you'd appreciate it," he muttered, his head in the bag.

Deborah unwrapped the parcel silently. Inside, looking out from a beautiful heavy silver frame, was Bryn's face. The gray eyes twinkled up at her; the mouth was firm and quiet. She looked at it. She handed it across to Grandmother. "You will like this," she said.



"All the Girls Are Crazy About Bryn."

Grandmother took it and held it silently before her. After a moment Deborah saw her fumbling for her handkerchief. She wiped her eyes, surreptitiously. She loved him. She loved him as much as that.

"There," Tubby said, lifting a fiery red face. "There, right at the very bottom, of course. Now this is from Madeline."

It was a most exquisite rose-colored silk shawl covered with pale-blue embroidered flowers in small perfect stitches, and a long pale blue fringe. "It's to match the crystals," Tubby explained, quite unnecessarily. Deborah's hand caressed the heavy silk. "I love it," she told him gently. "Is Madeline your sister too?"

"Well, no," Tubby said, with what seemed to her a hint of embarrassment. "Not exactly. She's Simon's sister, so of course she's practically in the family. She's an extremely nice girl."

"Has she been a friend of Bryn's all his life, too?"

"Well, yes. Practically."

"Do they . . ." Deborah stopped. Her violet eyes were fixed on his face. She waited.

Tubby coughed. "You know how it is," he explained with a wave of his hand. "All the girls are crazy about Bryn. Always were. They're bound to be a little upset to think he's married now and gone."

"Is Madeline upset?"

Tubby laughed heartily. "Oh, I don't think so," he said. "She's too sensible for that."

"I see," Deborah said quietly.

Grandmother looked up from the shawl and lifted the picture again. "Would it be possible to have another copy made of this?" she inquired.

"I'm sure I can get any number," Tubby said at once. "They're Bryn's graduation pictures. He's wearing the gown and hood there. I can get 'em from the photographer in Palo Alto."

"Palo Alto?"

"That's where Bryn graduated, of course, at Stanford."

"Stanford?" Grandmother repeated, with wrinkled brows. "Isn't that rather strange?"

What Irvin S. Cobb Thinks about

Deporting Alien Criminals.

SANTA MONICA, CALIF.—Wouldn't it be lovely if the other states, not to mention the federal government, followed the example set by the governor of New York?

He commutes the sentences of foreign-born, long-term convicts so they may be eligible for parole—not mind you, to go free and sin some more, but to be turned over to the port authorities for immediate deportation.

Irvin S. Cobb.

That is, it would be a lovely idea if only we could be sure that these same criminals wouldn't come slipping back in again. The present immigration law was devised as a barrier to protect decent citizens, both native and naturalized, against the human scum of the old world, but it appears to be more like a sieve if we may judge by the hordes of nondesirable aliens who somehow manage to get in and stay in and even go on relief, some of them.

In other words, when we give these unpleasant parties a complimentary ride back where they come from, let's make sure it's not going to be a round trip.

* * *

Missionaries From China.

FROM Peiping a group of believers in the doctrine of Confucius are sending missionaries to the United States. We've been sending out missionaries to their country for centuries, but that Chinamen should dare to try the same thing on us—well, that's a white horse of a yellow color.

What if, not content with seeking converts, these interlopers inculcated among us certain phases of their heathenish philosophy, such as teaching young people consideration and respect for their elders; and showing that rushing about in a frenzy does not necessarily indicate business energy; and that the natural aim of man is not always to worship speed and—up to thirty-odd thousands a year—to die by it; and that intolerance as between religious creeds isn't invariably proof of true piety; and that minding one's own affairs is really quite an admirable trait?

Why, native Americans wouldn't be able to recognize the old homeplace any more!

Such threats against a superior civilization are not to be borne.

* * *

Vanished Americans.

IT'S exciting to prowl among the ruined cities of the first Americans, who scattered into the twilights of antiquity when the Christian era was still young. They were our oldest families, older than even old Southern families—and who ever heard of a new Southern family or even just a middle-aged Southern family?

But afterwards, it's confusing to read the theories of the expert researchers who have passed judgment on those vanished cliff-dwelling peoples, because few such learned gentlemen agree on any single point. There is one very eminent authority who invariably insists that all the rest of the eminent authorities are absolutely wrong about everything. He is the Mr. Justice McReynolds of the archeologists.

After reading some of the conflicting literature on this subject, I've decided that a true scientist is one who is positive there are no other true scientists.

* * *

Unemployment Statistics.

THANKS to bright young bureaucrats in Washington, we know how many goldfish are hatched every year and what the gross annual yield of guinea pigs is, and the exact proportion of albinos born in any given period, but it never seemed to occur to anybody to compile reasonably accurate statistics on unemployment.

Yet, with depression behind us and business up to boom-time levels, it's estimated that between eight and nine million people are out of work, not counting those on strike, and judging by the papers there must be a couple of million of them. Apparently the more prosperous we grow on the surface, the more deplorable becomes the status of those off the payrolls. It doesn't make sense. Or anyhow there was a time when it wouldn't have made sense.

This curious situation puts a fellow in mind of the old old story of the chap whose wife had an operation, and, every day when he called at the hospital, he was told the patient showed improvement. One morning, as he came away, weeping, he met a friend.

"How's the wife?" inquired the latter.

"She's dead."

"I'm so sorry," said the friend. "What did she die of?"

"Improvements," said the widower.

Spots in America That Resist the Melting Pot

Festivals of Various Kinds Call Attention to "Bits of Europe" Here.

"It takes celebrations like a tulip festival to call one's attention to the many 'bits of Europe' scattered throughout the United States," says a bulletin from the National Geographic society.

"Recently thousands of flower-loving Americans descended on Holland, Michigan, to witness the town's annual tulip festival. The gay blooms stretching for eight miles, lure visitors each spring to this largely Dutch community sprinkled with Dutch names and, for the festival period, with residents in Dutch costumes.

A "Little Greece" in Florida.

"Holland is one of the largest Dutch communities in the United States. Until recently, many of its factory workers spoke only Dutch, and neighboring farmers wore wooden shoes.

"Tarpon Springs, about half way down the west coast of the Florida peninsula, is the home of many swarthy, mustachioed Greek sponge divers and their families. They came to the warm blue waters of Florida fisheries from the sponge fishing grounds of the Mediterranean, and have made Tarpon Springs famous as a 'sponge city.' Their brightly painted diving boats are patterned after those used in Greek waters. The town supports a Greek Orthodox church, and on January 6 annually celebrates Greek Cross day, a religious fete brought from the homeland.

"Northwestern Pennsylvania has its Russians. Nearly half a century ago, some 'Old Believers,' descendants of seceders from the Russian church in the Seventeenth century, settled in Erie. The Russian colony now numbers about 2,000 inhabitants. Folk songs are sung to balalaika accompaniment by bearded men and long-haired women.

Finns Settled in Forest Lands.

"Although Finns dwell in small numbers in every state in the Union, they have not found the South appealing, and have settled chiefly in Michigan, Minnesota, Massachusetts, and Washington. From Finland, 'the Land of a Thousand Lakes,' they have been especially drawn to Minnesota. Their physical stamina and experience as lumberjacks in Finland's vast forests have fitted many of them particularly well to take part in America's lumber industry.

"The Finns retain their love of education, flocking to schools and night classes. As in their home land, they build log bathhouses in which to take steam baths, and carve from birchwood skis which carry them over the fields in rigorous winters. Finland, Suomi, Toimi, and Toivola are some Minnesota place names that tell of Finnish population.

Shipping Lures Dalmatians.

"For centuries Dalmatians have either tilled the soil or sailed under Ragusan and other flags all over the world. Today these dark, spirited people, with blood of bold sea rovers in their veins, not only man the orange-sailed fishing boats off the Dalmatian coast, but they man American ships and work in fisheries of Louisiana, Florida, and California.

"From green vineyards, gray olive groves, fig and orange orchards steeped in almost perpetual sunshine along the Dalmatian coast, have come many of the large commercial fruit growers of the Pacific coast, particularly those in Santa Cruz and Santa Clara counties. Watsonville, south of San Francisco, has a population almost entirely Yugoslavian.

"The majority of fishermen in Provincetown, Massachusetts, are Portuguese. Their ancestors sailed there on whalers from Portugal and the Azores. The city directory is filled with names that sound strange among those of most New England towns: last names such as Silva, Ramos, Furtado, Costa, Zora, Dutra, Cabral, Almeda, Agna, and Corea."

Somehow the Proverb Sounded a Bit Off

He had only recently joined the ranks of politicians, and he was anxious that his first speech to his prospective constituents should be a great success, says London Answers.

He spoke for a long time, warning his hearers of the dangers of war and the importance of keeping a large army. Wishing to finish with some quotation, he thought of the proverb about locking the stable door. But he wanted to be a bit more original.

Suddenly he had a brain-wave. "Ladies and gentlemen," he cried, "don't, I beg of you—don't wait till your house catches fire before calling the fire brigade."

Your Job

DO YOU realize that your job is the most important affair in the world, just because it is your job? The way you look at your job makes all the difference to your career. Do you regard it only as a money-making stunt? Or do you consider it a position to be proud of?

If you put your heart and soul into your effort, you are bound to make good and will wake up one fine morning to discover that you are one of the indispensables. The world respects you because it cannot get along without you.—Geoffrey Rhodes.

Firestone TIRES
GIVE YOU GREATER PROTECTION AGAINST SKIDDING AND BLOWOUTS

YOU will know the minute you see this tire why car owners everywhere call it the greatest tire ever made to sell at these low prices. The deeper, wider, flatter non-skid tread made of tough, long wearing rubber will give you protection against dangerous skidding.

But tires cannot be judged on tread alone. Under the tread of Firestone Standard Tires are two extra layers of Gum-Dipped cords. This Firestone patented construction feature binds the tread and cord body into one inseparable unit. Every cotton fiber in every cord in every ply is saturated and coated with pure liquid rubber which counteracts the internal friction and heat that ordinarily destroy tire life. This Firestone patented process of Gum-Dipping gives greater protection against blowouts and is used only in Firestone Tires.

See your nearby Firestone Dealer or Firestone Auto Supply and Service Store and join the Firestone Save a Life Campaign today by equipping your car with a set of new Firestone Standard Tires.

Don't Irritate Gas Bloating

If you want to really GET RID OF GAS and terrible bloating, don't expect to do it by just doctoring your stomach with harsh, irritating alkalies and "gas tablets." You can't eat or sleep. Your head aches. Your back aches. Your complexion is sallow and pimply. Your breath is foul. You are a sick, grouchy, wretched, unhappy person. YOUR SYSTEM IS POISONED.

Thousands of sufferers have found in Adlerika the quick, scientific way to rid their systems of harmful bacteria. Adlerika rids you of gas and cleans foul poisons out of BOTH upper and lower bowels. Watch Your Kidneys!

Help Them Cleanse the Blood of Harmful Body Waste

Your kidneys are constantly filtering waste matter from the blood stream. But kidneys sometimes lag in their work—do not act as Nature intended—fail to remove impurities that, if retained, may poison the system and upset the whole body machinery.

Symptoms may be nagging backache, persistent headache, attacks of dizziness, getting up nights, swelling, puffiness under the eyes—a feeling of nervous anxiety and loss of pep and strength.

Other signs of kidney or bladder disorder may be burning, scanty or too frequent urination.

There should be no doubt that prompt treatment is wiser than neglect. Use Doan's Pills. Doan's have been winning new friends for more than forty years. They have a nation-wide reputation. Are recommended by grateful people the country over. Ask your neighbor!

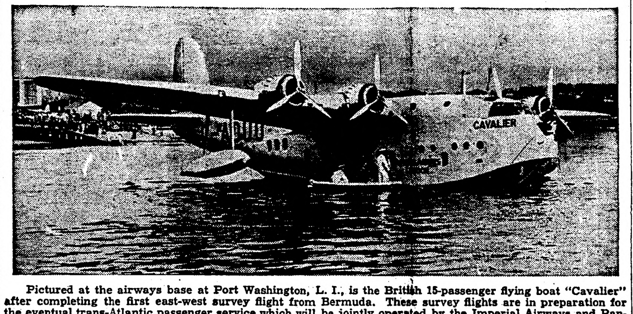
British Plane Blazes Trail for Overseas Line



Pictured at the airways base at Port Washington, L. I., is the British 15-passenger flying boat "Cavalier" after completing the first east-west survey flight from Bermuda. These survey flights are in preparation for the eventual trans-Atlantic passenger service which will be jointly operated by the Imperial Airways and Pan-American Airways. Simultaneously with the Cavalier's flight, a Pan-American Sikorsky clipper made the west-east flight to Bermuda.
